Formation Guide for Opening a Hospitality House for Asylum Seekers

by
Tiffani Cox Harris
Date: 30 November 2023

Approved:

First Reader: Dr. Lauren Winner

Second Reader: Dr. Sarah Musser

D.Min. Director: Dr. Will Willimon

A thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Ministry in the Divinity School of Duke University 2023
ABSTRACT

Formation Guide for Opening a Hospitality House for Asylum Seekers

By

Tiffani Cox Harris

Date: 30 November 2023

Approved:

[Signature]

First Reader: Dr. Lauren Winner

[Signature]

Second Reader: Dr. Sarah Musser

[Signature]

D.Min. Director: Dr. Will Willimon

An abstract of a thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Ministry in the Divinity School of Duke University

2023
ABSTRACT

This thesis, in part, seeks to provide a foundation for understanding the Christian call to ministry with those who are poor and suffering, specifically with the asylum seeker. It is a resource and formation guide for congregations and individuals sensing a call from God to extend themselves in this way. The project provides a foundation of Christian history and Scripture that speaks to the call of Christ to deny self and follow him in ministry with the least—those who are hungry, thirsty, poor, and forgotten. Included is some guidance on how to structure a ministry of this sort, important questions to consider, and reflection upon leadership challenges that arise in this type of work. It tells the story of one congregation’s approach to developing a ministry of a hospitality house for asylum-seekers and why churches should recover the discipline of hospitality.
This thesis is dedicated to my patient and encouraging family and to the people of God at DaySpring Baptist Church for their courage, grace, and mercy.
Table of Contents

Preface ....................................................................................................................... 1

Chapter 1. An Introduction to “Building” a Hospitality House Ministry .................... 6

- Accompaniment and Companioning ................................................................................... 8
  - What is Christian Hospitality? .......................................................................................... 11
  - Who is the Asylum Seeker? .............................................................................................. 20
  - “Bare life” and Hallowing ............................................................................................... 24
  - Review of Relevant Literature on Hospitality ................................................................. 27
  - Why the Church Needs Ministry to those on the Margins Like the Asylum Seeker ....... 29
  - Overview of Thesis ......................................................................................................... 34

Chapter 2. Laying the Foundation .............................................................................. 37

- Part One. Pastoral and Theological Preparation—Equipping the Minister ...................... 37
  - Hospitality and Mercy to Sufferers: The Church’s Response through History .......... 38
  - How the Christian Church Changed the View and Response to Suffering ................. 42
  - An Early Christian Understanding of Suffering and Mercy: A Living Catechism ......... 43
  - Middle Ages and Reformation ......................................................................................... 51
  - Modernity ....................................................................................................................... 53
  - Examples of Hospitality and Mercy and Justice ............................................................ 59

- Part Two. Educational Preparation—Equipping the Congregation ................................. 61
  - A Congregational Study Outline .................................................................................... 62
  - Viewing the Old Testament through the Lens of Migration ......................................... 63
  - The New Testament and Hospitality .............................................................................. 66
  - The Early Church and Church History ......................................................................... 71
  - The Current Situation for Asylum Seekers ................................................................. 72
  - Mark 8: Following Christ ............................................................................................... 73

Chapter 3. Developing Blueprints and Setting Structure ............................................. 77

- Vocation and Calling ....................................................................................................... 78
  - Transformation .............................................................................................................. 80
  - Envisioning a Ministry .................................................................................................. 84

- Framing and Setting the Structure .................................................................................. 90
  - The Process .................................................................................................................. 91
  - Vision and Values ........................................................................................................ 92
  - Discernment ................................................................................................................. 95
  - Seed Money: Seeing the Possibility ............................................................................. 97
  - Ministry Purpose Statement and Covenant ............................................................... 98
  - Hosts and Guests: Roles and Responsibilities ............................................................. 100
  - The House: Structuring the Ministry .......................................................................... 101
  - Trauma-Healing Congregation .................................................................................... 103
  - Strengths-Based Approach ......................................................................................... 105
  - Cultural Humility ........................................................................................................ 107

Chapter 4: Maintaining a House and Ministry ............................................................. 109

- Constraints as Opportunities .......................................................................................... 111
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Leadership for Ministry</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transformative Leadership</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adaptive Leadership</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Group Dynamics</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spiritual Formation for Flourishing</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Longevity and Replication</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worship and Liturgy</td>
<td>127</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 5. Conclusion: Theological and Pastoral Reflection</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bearing Witness</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appendix I</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Questions for Reflection</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 2: Laying the Foundation</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 3: Developing Blueprints and Setting the Structure</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 4: Maintaining the House: The Skills that Were Called Forth</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chapter 5: Conclusion: Theological and Pastoral Reflection</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appendix II</td>
<td>144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Resources: Choruses, Prayers, Litanies</td>
<td>144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BIBLIOGRAPHY</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Preface

“When you cross the border, no one will be there to help you.” These words, uttered by a woman in Mexico, weighed heavy on Maria’s heart as she nervously waited in line to see a Customs and Border Protection officer on the southern U.S. border. Maria lived in hiding for a year in her own Central American country after the cartel pushed her family off their land. She did not want to flee her homeland, but she felt she had no choice. Her husband and son were murdered while she and her three other children watched at gunpoint. Her farm had been taken over to produce drugs. Her family was forever changed by the violence. They fled in the middle of the night for their safety, never to return. They sought refuge elsewhere in their home country, but the tentacles of the cartel reached far and wide and found them. One by one, the cartel hunted down their extended family and pushed them off their land and out of the country. The government was impotent to stop them.

Maria’s pastor, who led a small Baptist church in the middle of this indigenous community, continued to pray for her, and they communicated over the phone. Indigenous persons are being pushed off their lands all over the Americas,¹ and she had papers documenting it, which she presented to the Customs and Border Protection agent at the border. The agent determined she had a credible threat and let Maria and her three children enter the country and apply for asylum. Over the course of a year, they had walked and traveled over 2,000 miles to get to the border. Maria crossed the border with her children and walked the streets of West Brownsville, Texas, wondering and praying what she should do next. A woman from North Carolina who had been serving with a Spanish-speaking Baptist church’s shelter found Maria and her children on the street. She took them to the church and began to care for them, helping them find food and clothing, a shower, and a place to rest. Over the course of a few days, Maria noted that this woman was like a mother to her, caring for her family. This is when the associate pastor of the church in West Brownsville called me.

Our church in Waco, Texas had been praying and preparing to open a hospitality house for asylum seekers. This journey began several years ago, and we were finally as ready as we would ever be to welcome our first family. With guidance from a Cooperative Baptist Fellowship missionary in the Rio Grande Valley of Texas, we met pastors and churches on the border who run short-term shelters, in hopes that they would refer families to us. Part of our discernment process led us to be focused, starting small, seeking to create space to build relationships and companionship. Rather than operating a short-term shelter with different people each week, we felt our calling was to build relationships with the least of the least, whom we determined was the Latina asylum seeker and her children. We decided to provide mid-term length housing for these women until they receive their Employment Authorization Documents (EAD) which typically takes 9-12 months.

As Naomi in scripture opened her heart to Ruth and brought her under her wing, so to speak, we wanted to create space for this kind of mutuality and hospitality. The story of Ruth and Naomi is one of reciprocity, for Naomi allowed Ruth to accompany her, taking her back to her people and her home, and conversely, Ruth also accompanied and cared for Naomi, demonstrating the reciprocity of a God-centered community.

Church members drove eight hours to the border to pick up this exhausted family and bring them to our hospitality house, a mid-term length shelter. Upon arriving, the first phone call Maria made was to her Baptist pastor in Central America. It was a proud moment for me, a Baptist pastor who has often been frustrated with the denomination, to see this family cared for by three Baptist congregations along the way, and it brought great comfort to the Honduran pastor back home to hear of the care these churches had provided.

This story of Maria and her family and the story of how our church came to the place of accompanying asylum seekers is in the background of this thesis. For years, I have heard from more conservative and evangelical wings in the Baptist tradition that concern for the poor and those on the margins of life was more of a liberal political ideology than a Bible-centered priority. The attitude of many evangelicals is that social justice has left Jesus behind and has become an end in and of itself, and that it is dangerously undermining biblical authority.²

---

I spoke with a Baptist pastor in London, charged with the task of local mission support, who mentioned that social ministry that does not overtly share the Gospel by not offering the “true bread that is life” is deficient and essentially leads others astray. On the other hand, many in social ministries recoil against requiring hungry, homeless people to listen to a sermon before they can be fed, for they feel like this type of forced evangelism is coerced and does not respect the dignity of those receiving support and help. While some critique ministry of this sort as neglecting to offer the true bread that sustains life, and that messages of spiritual salvation should be of primary importance before any other type of interaction and ministry, caring for the poor and the stranger can and should attend to the physical, social, and spiritual needs of those caught in the immigration crisis of our time. In building relationships in this way, we are sharing the love of Christ where actions speak louder than words. Words about the love and transformation that life in Christ offers are important and yet also impotent without demonstrated relation-building and companionship.

This thesis, in part, seeks to provide a foundation for understanding the Christian call to ministry with those who are poor and suffering, specifically with the asylum seeker. I hope it will also be a guide for those sensing a call from God to extend themselves in this way. The project provides a foundation of Christian history and Scripture that speaks to the call of Christ to deny self and follow him in ministry with the least—those who are hungry, thirsty, poor, and forgotten. Included is some guidance on how to structure a ministry of this sort and reflect upon leadership challenges that arise in this type of work.

---

Chapter 1. An Introduction to “Building” a Hospitality House Ministry

This thesis is born out of my church’s experience as we came to share our lives with those seeking asylum. It is one church’s story that might also serve as both an invitation and a guide for other churches wanting to develop similar types of ministries. Eight hours from the border, deep in the heart of the red state of Texas, in a midsized city, our ideologically diverse church opened a hospitality house for asylum seekers, one of only a handful in the state. We knew we had so much to learn, so we started small, built a coalition, listened, reflected, and humbly began.

In this chapter, I define terms such as Christian hospitality, companioning, and asylum seeker, and provide a short review of the relevant literature on hospitality. I conclude with why the church universal needs to be engaged with this kind of ministry and with an overview of the thesis.

Months after a family in the church opened their home to a young asylum-seeking mother with a newborn, we had a team of friends who supported this family. She had walked all the way from Honduras to the border, pregnant and alone. The threat of violence was so real and severe that staying in the country was not an option. The tentacles of violence seemed to seep into every nook and cranny. She discovered that nowhere would be safe for her and her child. Once she was with us, church members helped provide rides to appointments, stopped by for visits and prayer with her, and looked for ways that she might find work. Some supported her in selling tamales, others connected her with women who might be able to help her learn a trade. After a couple of years of this kind of support, we began to dream about how we might companion other women in similar situations. Over the years, some have found our church because of this budding interest. Word got out in the community that we were interested in this, and a local Mennonite house church wanted to sell its house for use for immigrants. They contacted us and other interested people in the community for a conversation.

As a staff who had been inspired by Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s Life Together and the new-monasticism movement, we had been nursing a dream for almost ten years of starting an intentional community or communal living. (Our small group ministry for years was called “life together groups” and my position is “Associate Pastor of Community Life.” Much of my job description is facilitating the building of community.) Some in the congregation also held this desire while others desired to walk alongside the most vulnerable. Before our trip to San Antonio to visit the Mary and Martha House, our church took many trips to Honduras and El Salvador, developing relationships with ministries happening there. We saw first-hand why people are compelled to leave the region. We also invited friends from these countries to our church to visit and share their stories with us. These experiences helped prepare the congregation to be receptive to what God might be calling us to do.

After a family in the church opened their home to an asylum-seeker and her baby, church members began praying for how God might be leading us, some in groups and others separately. We became increasingly aware that for our congregation, we needed to share our lives with those seeking asylum. This meant that we wanted complete ownership in this type of ministry. We debated about whether to start a non-profit instead, but we ultimately landed on the hospitality house being a ministry of the church. We resisted the idea of starting a non-profit, for that seemed in some ways the easy way out and what many people do—start a nonprofit to meet a need. We wanted to be all in and hands-on. Of course, some had reservations and fears and said, “This is too much. How can we do this? Do we want to be so consumed?” One of our church mottos has been “many hands make light work,” a phrase we hear each year when church members sign up to serve in the church in some capacity. We have adopted that phrase as we talk about this ministry with the congregation.

Accompaniment and Companioning

Because Christ accompanies us, our congregation has sought to open our hearts in accompaniment with those who are often overlooked and ignored, such as those seeking asylum and refuge. In our context, the Spirit of God had been moving in our congregation slowly to turn our hearts towards the needs of the marginalized. As a contemplative Baptist church, the spiritual practices of the contemplative life began to seek an outward expression of demonstrating God’s love in action. Opening our hearts in this way was new. The concept of companioning is one of mutuality and hospitality and comes from the practice of spiritual direction. Spiritual companioning is an intentional accompanying of others through prayerful reflection and conversation that helps others notice God’s work in the world. This type of contemplative spirituality has shaped our congregation in ways that have deepened both individuals’ faith and the community’s relationships, resulting in an outward expression of this inner renewal. Companioning is 3 In Luke 24:13-32, Jesus accompanies the disciples in their grief on the road to Emmaus. In Matthew 9:19, Jesus follows the grieving father to his house. In Mark 6:47-51, Jesus walks on the water to the disciples in the boat during the storm and gets in the boat with them. Also consider God’s presence with the Israelites wandering in the desert as a pillar of cloud by day and fire by night in Exodus 13.

4 Our church values silence and a posture of listening for God and regularly practices contemplative prayer, such as Centering prayer, lectio divina (divine reading of scripture) and prayers rooted in the liturgical traditions.
used as a verb in this way to indicate the active commitment to a particular way of being with others.

In companionship, power differentials are equalized. We as a congregation are not acting as spiritual directors in the official sense, but we approach our ministry with the accompaniment of God in mind. While we have an active spiritual direction program in our congregation, most of those who serve in this ministry with immigrants are not involved in spiritual direction, yet the language and concepts of contemplative spirituality pervade the ethos of the congregation. I personally serve in a spiritual direction capacity in my ministerial role in the congregation and try to use a model of spiritual companioning with our guests in the hospitality house. The image I see when I think of a companion is one who walks with you. I remember the pillar of cloud by day and the fire by night in Exodus 13, as the Spirit of God companioned the people of God through the desert. I remember Christ companioning the broken-hearted and distraught followers on the road to Emmaus. In spiritual direction, we often refer to what happens in spiritual direction as being a spiritual companion with another on their journey—walking alongside someone as they seek God, reflecting with them about spiritual observations, and helping them to see God’s presence in their lives.

On my first pastoral care visit for a new family in the hospitality house, I had been personally struggling with trying to see where God was in a painful situation in my life. This encounter is a perfect example of the kind of companionship we were hoping to facilitate. I entered the home hoping to companion our new guests and share of Christ’s presence with them, and they ministered to me as well. Here is an excerpt from my journal that day.

---

Before walking into the Naomi House, our hospitality house for asylum seekers, for a pastoral care conversation with two new women in the home, I prayed and thought through how I might try to describe, in Spanish, the suffering Christ. These women had narrowly escaped death, slept on streets, and begged for food, all after living in hiding for a year. Their story is horrific and yet not uncommon. How could I convey that amid unspeakable suffering, Christ was with them, grieving and walking, hiding, and crying? We sat down for our visit, and I reviewed the Spanish verbs in my head, all the while trying to keep everything in the present tense. I tend to crack them up with laughter when I try to speak in the future or past. While I am sure they can use the laugh, and it is good for them to see me as utterly deficient, I tried to find ways to convey the love of Christ with present tense conjugations.

Before we could get very far, the tears started to flow and each shared how they knew that Christ was with them in their suffering. It was as clear as day to them that Christ had companioned them in their pain. They shared with me about the suffering Christ, who shared in their journey. They already knew what I wanted to share with them, and they taught me. Through lived experience, they had encountered Christ in their suffering. Buoyed by the teachings of their tiny Baptist church in the jungle of Central America, a one-room building with open-air windows and dirt floors, they had learned of Christ’s suffering on the cross and how Christ walks with those who suffer. They still had hurt and questions and one confessed that she was still reconciling (reconciliando con Dios) with God. “Yo tambien, cada dia,” I responded.

They testified to me in full vulnerability about their grief and sorrow mingled with the assurance of Christ’s presence through it. I was inspired and humbled by their deep understanding of Christ.

---

7 For more information on Latinas fleeing Central America, see the full report from the UNHCR, “Women on the Run” https://www.unhcr.org/us/media/women-run-full-report (October 2015).
What is Christian Hospitality?

The term hospitality is often deprived of its richness in popular American culture by being relegated to entertaining and dinner parties or making one’s home beautiful for others to enjoy. It is easy to think of Magnolia and Fixer Upper, the TV network and home improvement and hospitality empire started by Chip and JoAnne Gains of Waco, Texas (where I also live). They have become the modern version of Southern Living and Martha Stewart. The giant hospitality industry in the U.S. involves dining, travel, food, lodging, and more. Christian hospitality, however, is something altogether different.

Christian hospitality has Jesus Christ at its core, who opened himself to the world for the sake of God’s kingdom. Christian hospitality is about making room and extending oneself on behalf of another. It is about opening ourselves as Christ opened himself. In Christian hospitality, the stakes are high for people’s souls and well-being, and sometimes even their lives are at stake. Vulnerable people sleep on our streets and wait in tents at our border. The needs of those seeking refuge and the poor can be overwhelming and the pull of daily life often impedes offering help to these complex situations. Sharing Christian hospitality is not easy or simple— in our fast-paced world it has been one of the historically distinguishing traits of Christians that is at risk of becoming extinct.

It is common for people to understand the virtue of hospitality as something akin to generosity. In this understanding, hospitality is something to give or share with another. Often shared by one who has power and position, it is commonly a one-way interaction: there is a giver and a receiver. In Dependent Rational Animals, Alasdair MacIntyre describes virtues that humans need to flourish, asserting that social dependence is among the most important. He understands hospitality as grounded in “misericordia,” the capacity for grief or sorrow over someone else’s distress, or the ability to empathize with someone else’s pain.\(^8\) Misericordia is at the heart of hospitality and is not only an outward expression of the theological virtue of charity, but a secular and moral virtue as well. MacIntyre argues that as a virtue, hospitality goes beyond sentimentality and meets the urgent needs of those who are afflicted. It extends communal relationships to those who are outside the community and is a necessary virtue for communal life. This type of empathy is the ability to share in another’s situation. Whereas some Christians relegate hospitality to creating community with other Christians (which is also important), hospitality of and with strangers is a necessity if humans are to flourish as God intends for all human flourishing.\(^9\)

In recent years, this type of hospitality often has not been a central part of faith expression for many Christians. It can seem to be a practice that was common in another era, but unsuitable for the modern and “dangerous” world (as if the pre-modern world were not dangerous). To reclaim hospitality as a central part of the Christian faith, we must understand Christian hospitality as centered in the hospitable God, for it has always been central to the faith of those seeking God. In Making Room: Recovering Hospitality as a Christian Tradition, Christine Pohl makes just this point claiming that the current use of the term hospitality has lost its moral component. She begins her book with a quote from author Henri Nouwen: “If there is any concept worth restoring to its original depth and evocative potential, it is the concept of hospitality.”\(^10\) She argues that “the possibility of receiving Jesus ‘unawares’ has historically intensified and influenced the practice of Christian hospitality in showing charity to the stranger.”

---

Both Joshua Jipp and Christine Pohl suggest that in hospitality the stranger becomes connected and known. To be known involves deep listening and sharing, making space for one another. In this making space, the Holy Spirit shows up, connecting hearts and making way for healing and hope to emerge. This is what God longs to do in the world, to reconcile all to himself and each other. Understanding hospitality in this way underscores how essential it is for the church. Letty Russell in Just Hospitality describes how hospitality is more than charitable welcome. For the Christian, it is necessarily linked with justice. Quoting Pohl, she emphasizes its essential role in the Christian life: “Hospitality is not optional for Christians . . . it is a necessary practice in the community of faith.” Strangers are brought into the Christian community, where the Holy Spirit brings to fruition God’s work of redeeming brokenness and establishing justice for a world in need of repair.

Highlighted in this paper is a recent resurgence in writing on faith and hospitality that has arisen during the transition from modernity to post-modernity. I believe this resurgence has arisen for several reasons, including an overall decline of a sense of community, an epidemic of loneliness, and the new era of mass migration. This new

---

11 Ellen Clark Clemot, Discerning Welcome: A Reformed Faith Approach to Refugees (Eugene, OR: Cascade Books, 2022), 83. See also Christine Pohl, Making Room Recovering Hospitality as a Christian Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999), 68.
12 Joshua Jipp, quoted in Pohl, Making Room, xxx.
13 Russell quotes Pohl from Making Room, 1.
era of modern mass migration shows no signs of stopping as countries struggle under the weight of corruption, economic despair, and climate-driven vulnerability. Increasingly, the church is no longer the center of North American society and suffers from a loss of credibility due to scandals and infighting. In this new era of mass migration, media highlights the plight of those on the margins in both helpful and detrimental ways that keep the issue in the foreground. With these converging factors, I suggest that the church recover Christian hospitality as a discipline and virtue essential to the livelihood of the church.

While many North American Christians may not define their Christian identity as one of a homeless foreigner, this theme is an important part of the Christian faith that often has been overlooked by those in the West. In the Old Testament, the people of God were sojourners and refugees, on a journey of migration with God as their guide. For a generation, they were homeless migrants. Based on Israel’s own experience, taking care of the sojourner is an important part of the law of God as found in the Old Testament. Continued in the New Testament, in the second chapter of Matthew, the holy family fled violence in the middle of the night and sought asylum in Egypt, which was a strange country for them. Scripture says that Christ had nowhere to lay his head (Matt. 8:20), highlighting the homelessness of Christ throughout his ministry, beginning in his infancy. In Toronto, sculptor Timothy Schmaltz created a visual translation of this verse, depicting Jesus as a homeless person sleeping on a park bench with a blanket over him. Rosemary 19 See Schmaltz’s sculpture here: http://www.sculpturebytps.com/about-the-artist/.

---

Radford Ruether describes Jesus’ homelessness as kenosis, or the voluntary renunciation of power for the purpose of submitting to God’s will. In many ways our Christian vocation is also one of kenosis, of giving up power for the sake of submitting to God’s ultimate purposes. Understanding Christ’s kenosis and embracing the heritage of God’s faithfulness amidst a people who were without place and home should impact how Christians today interact with the issues of foreigners, the homeless, and those who are seeking asylum and safety.

Existing in community, the Trinity offers this community to all. God in holy hospitality created humankind for the purpose of communion with the Divine. Christ’s hospitality and opening of himself to others created space for God’s healing work to happen. By submitting to God’s will and plan, Christ gathered all in, creating community as he ministered along the way, sharing the gift of reconciliation with the world. Christ’s life demonstrates that hospitality is necessarily redemptive and communal, and thus core to the Christian faith.

Letty Russell describes four components of biblical hospitality: the unexpected divine presence, advocacy for the marginalized, mutual welcome, and creation of community. In connecting action and reflection, she suggests that “just (as in justice-seeking) hospitality” pays thoughtful consideration to examine power imbalances and seeks truthful confession and resistance to division. “The sort of hospitality that makes this possible would be one that sees the struggle for justice as part and parcel of welcoming the stranger.”

---

For our congregation, extending hospitality is participation in God’s justice. It is part of what it means to be co-laborers with God as God’s kingdom is developing this side of heaven. It is important to note that hospitality should be disentangled from power, as it should require nothing in return. Hospitality is relational and empathetic, creating space for mutuality, and in this space, reciprocity can emerge, but it is never required nor coerced. Luke Bretherton describes hospitality as a virtue necessary for living in a pluralistic society. It is not to be confused with philanthropy, which often has undercurrents of someone with power and position giving to those on the “outside.” It is not one-sided but makes room for commonality. In hospitality, a commonality is discovered, differences diminish, and connections emerge. Lives that once lived in different worlds and countries discover friendship and a shared faith in God. Families from one culture find common interest with a family from another while sharing a meal together. New recipes shared and received build bridges between cultures forging new friendships. Common meaning emerges when we connect on the most basic of human levels, when we connect through our shared humanity.

In one visit with guests in the Naomi House, I was personally processing a grief in which I struggled to see how God could redeem the pain a loved one had suffered, nor could I see where God was amidst that pain. I was at the Naomi House to pray with and encourage our guests. As I spoke with the woman, she shared with me how she was clinging to the knowledge in her head that God was with her through her painful journey and trauma, but at the same time she was still working things out with God. She and God had unfinished business, and she was living in that tension. It was a moment of reminder for me, that I too can and do live in that tension as well. She gave a gift of encouragement to me that day. Another young asylum-seeking woman from our ministry has been so impacted by the ministry that she wanted to find a way to give back to me. When she got into a housing situation of her own, one of her first acts was to invite me into her house for a meal. I had to make space for these reversals of hospitality. I opened myself in vulnerability to relationships with these women, ready to receive with gracious thanksgiving the gifts that they shared with me. Reciprocity is part of biblical hospitality, where mutual giving and receiving take place.

---

Luke 24 describes Cleopas and his companion walking from Jerusalem to Emmaus on Resurrection Sunday. They spoke of all that had happened with Christ’s execution and the empty tomb. Bewildered, they encountered a stranger on the dusty road. Christ, the sojourner, walked with the travelers, accompanying them. Not recognizing Jesus, Cleopas called him a stranger and then explained with a downcast face all their hopes and disappointment. They had hoped that Jesus Christ would be the Messiah, but he had been killed and his body was now missing. In their confusion and bewilderment, these travelers then extended hospitality (as they had been taught) to Christ the foreigner or outsider, while still unable to see that he was the Christ. Inviting the outsider into the home, it was then, in the breaking of bread and sharing of a meal that Christ revealed himself. In a strange reversal, Christ the guest became host. Christian hospitality demonstrates mutuality and a commonly shared meaning. Eventually, hospitality involves reciprocity, so that the one opening and extending hospitality also opens to receiving it when it is offered back. Contrary to popular opinion, hospitality has... at its core a sense of mutuality and respect that empowers the receiver to become a giver. This is what distinguishes it from philanthropy.

Hospitality is the love of the stranger or philoxenia in Greek, as opposed to xenophobia, which is fear of strangers. We partner with Christ in koinonia (Christian fellowship) to extend hospitality, thus sharing the hospitable God with others. All this is for the sake of God’s kingdom on earth, as we regularly pray in the Lord’s Prayer. Hospitality often takes on the virtues of justice and mercy, which traditionally is understood as giving what is not due or compassionate treatment of those in distress. Hospitality is taking in an orphan or an immigrant who has suffered violence and has nowhere to go; it is also mercy that seeks to try to make things right. While hospitality cannot fix all problems, the significance of being brought into community or fellowship, receiving mercy, and being accompanied aid in making situations more just. It is part of extending the love and peace of Christ to all in practical ways. Each Sunday at the end of worship, we share the peace of Christ with the neighbor sitting next to us in worship, practicing how we are to engage with the world as we walk out the doors. This is part of what it means to be the hands and feet of Christ in this place. Thus, Christian hospitality is directly linked to mercy, which is a form of justice, with those who suffer.

The parable of the great feast in Luke 14:12-24 describes the kingdom of God as a feast in which the poor, the lame, and those on the margins of society are brought into table fellowship and friendship. In this passage, all those who suffer, including the list above and by extension countless others, are welcomed into the community. All are offered a seat at the table of feasting in God’s kingdom. Such hospitality brings others into community, offering relationship and the opportunity to seek God together.
Baptist theologian Elizabeth Newman defines hospitality as the Christian practice in which we also meet God. She states that hospitality is “our participation in what God is doing.” Hospitalit is not about benevolent giving so much as joining God and participating in God’s work, and in so doing, we are changed as well. Like the travelers on the road to Emmaus were changed after inviting Christ into the home and breaking bread with him, so we expectantly seek God’s transformation in our own lives. As will be seen in the pages that follow, this understanding of hospitality reflects the early church’s approach to Christian hospitality.

Western culture tends to seek insulation and protection. This avoidance of suffering inhibits our ability and desires to “be the hands and feet of Christ.” The old are sent to nursing homes, and there is a mentality that someone else will take care of all who do not fit the norm of society. Parents protect their children from consequences, despite the reality that it might be good for their well-being. Wars are now fought with drones. Some want to not teach about the history of racism in our country because it could cause discomfort to children. In our desire to ignore or isolate ourselves from the reality of suffering, we are tempted to think of it as a consequence or punishment that one deserves. Others think that suffering occurs because of a fault or personal shortcoming. This plays itself out in issues of the poor and the immigrant. Consciously and unconsciously, some think that the plight of the poor and the immigrant stem from personal failures to manage money or resources, associate with the wrong people, or not work hard enough. These judgments then prevent us from engaging, from serving, and thus from meeting Christ in their midst. Additionally, in our culture that prioritizes self-preservation, the “problem” of suffering can be one of many issues that leads to a falling away from the faith in our younger generations. By avoiding suffering we have sent the message to younger generations that suffering is a punishment from God or that Christ cannot be found in the suffering but only in the blessing. This does not ring true for them and has resulted in the church demonstrating a lack of credibility. This tendency to avoid suffering has infiltrated North American churches, as many remain siloed behind stained glass windows, from the suffering of the least of these in the world, lacking a clear mission to comfort the afflicted. Reclaiming the early church’s understanding of suffering can enliven our faith and strengthen the church to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century.

26 A quick google search on overprotective parenting yields many results on the dangers of protecting children too much and the importance of allowing them to face the consequences of their actions.

Who is the Asylum Seeker?

Much information has been produced in recent years about immigration, migration, refugees, and asylum seekers. According to the latest studies, there were 280.6 million global migrants in 2020, which is almost four percent of the world’s population. As of 2020, the number of people living outside their origin countries was at its historical high and more migrants chose the U.S. as their destination than any other country. Famine, war, violence, ineffective governments, lack of gainful employment, and natural disasters are all reasons that cause someone to flee their home country. The United Nations High Commission on Refugees (UNHCR) is the United Nations advocacy arm for refugees who are forcibly displaced; they provide a wealth of data on global migration while also tracking individual trends and aid for refugees.29

Pending asylum cases have reached an all-time high in the U.S., with nearly 1.6 million cases awaiting determination in the courts.30 During the 2022 fiscal year, 25,465 refugees were admitted to U.S., which Statista has tracked since 1990 when we admitted 125,000 refugees.31 Conversely the number of asylum seekers grew from 8,472 in 1990 to 30,964 in 2020 along with rises in border apprehensions.32 This drastic increase reflects the reality of the dawning era of mass migration of people not officially considered “refugees” and demands a new response to this critical predicament.33 It is difficult, however, to find clear data that shows the actual number of immigrants let into the country seeking asylum. In recent years, immigrants fleeing the Northern Triangle (Honduras, Guatemala, and El Salvador) were the majority of immigrants reaching the southern border. In 2023, however, more migrants have come from South America due to

29 For more information on global trends see the United Nations’ World Migration Report https://worldmigrationreport.iom.int/world-migration-report-2022-key-findings unrest in the region.\textsuperscript{34} The year 2022 broke previous records of undocumented migrants crossing the southern U.S. border, topping 2.76 million people.\textsuperscript{35} The statistics, policies, terminology, and rhetoric can be confusing. The asylum seekers, who have little recourse, are just one subset of immigrants. They are not afforded refugee status and therefore seek asylum and safety through the formal asylum request process as outlined by the U.S. government. The United Nations has long held that it is a fundamental right to seek asylum and advocates for this right worldwide. After the atrocities of World War II, when millions of Jews were denied asylum in America, the world began to change its views on asylum-seeking.\textsuperscript{36}

Refugees who are in imminent danger of losing their lives if they stay in their home country\textsuperscript{37} are often afforded refugee status by the U.N. High Court on Refugees (or Convention on Refugees). Many asylum seekers who present themselves at the border or a port of entry have similar threats of danger, yet most of them are not granted the status of refugee. An asylum seeker must present a credible threat\textsuperscript{38} at the border to be allowed into the country to pursue the legal means to seek asylum. Once in the country, asylum seekers must file a request for asylum with the courts within one year. If that official request is not filed in court within one year, they lose the opportunity to seek asylum and thus are deemed to be here illegally.

\textsuperscript{37}Clemot, \textit{Discerning Welcome}, 7.

A refugee and an asylum seeker both have paths to citizenship if they are granted resident alien status. If they are not granted this status, then they must leave the country or stay and risk deportation. For an asylum seeker, this process can take 3-5 years. Our congregation chose to companion Latina asylum-seekers because they seemed to be the most vulnerable of all immigrants. Refugees often have some funding and support that follows them through immigration and refugee services, whereas asylum-seekers do not. Women and children seeking asylum at the southern border are at risk for trafficking and exploitation by predatory organizations, workplaces, and individuals.

As Bretherton asserts, a key factor in determining refugee status is the presence of persecution that is personal in nature and precisely political. Many immigrants endure personal or political persecution but are not granted refugee or asylum status for a myriad of reasons. It can be hard to prove political or personal persecution and distinguish it from regional violence and unstable governments. If an immigrant does not have good legal representation or support in navigating the legal system, their case may not receive appropriate consideration.

Two common misconceptions about immigrants often prevent the church from engaging in ministry with those living on the margins, who have lost their rights and community. First, there is a misconception that anyone coming to the southern border is 39 At the time of the writing of this paper the legal asylum process can take 3-5 years. For more information see Rescue.org’s article, “Is it Legal to Cross the U.S. Border to Seek Asylum? (July 1, 2022), https://www.rescue.org/article/is-it-legal-to-cross-the-u-s-border-to-seek-asylum and https://www.americanimmigrationcouncil.org/research/asylum-united-states.

---

coming illegally. Political rhetoric often deliberately demonizes this vulnerable population, stoking fear and inaccurately spreading disinformation.\textsuperscript{41} Currently\textsuperscript{42} the only way for an immigrant to apply for asylum status is to present themselves at a border or port of entry requesting asylum, and to provide evidence of credible threat at that time. Border agents then decide if they will grant entry into the U.S. so they may then apply to have their case heard in court.\textsuperscript{43} Second, another misconception about immigrants is that they are draining “the system” and not paying taxes. They do pay sales tax, income tax (once they have work permits), and property tax via payments for rent. These myths about immigration and a cultivation of prejudice against immigrants contribute to indifference toward alleviating and addressing this unique kind of suffering. It is important to dispel these misconceptions and prejudice as a way of empowering the church to look squarely at the suffering, lament the suffering, and then seek the hope of Christ in it. In facing the darkness of the suffering of immigrants, and in facing the hard truth of the plight of asylum-seekers, Christ’s light then has a chance to shine and speak into those places of lament and bring redemption. We cannot be the hands and feet of Christ in this way without clearly seeing the reality of the lament.

\textbf{“Bare life” and Hallowing}

In \textit{Christianity and Contemporary Politics}, Bretherton builds upon Georgia Agamben’s description of the refugee as “bare life.” By this, he means a person who is reduced to life only, with no other rights as a human being. Refugees are devoid of rights (rights commonly afforded to a citizen) and their humanity, living a life that is excluded or banned from participation in society, having no country to claim as their own. They are repeatedly exposed to death and danger, and they are devalued. Bretherton argues that Christian cosmopolitanism sees, or bears witness to, the immigrant and the varying needs of each subset of immigrants (refugee, asylum-seeker, others). Each of these embodies “bare life,” or dehumanization, and Christian cosmopolitanism seeks constructive ways to address their gaping needs. Bretherton additionally assesses the practice of sanctuary and the U.S. sanctuary movement as one way of addressing immigrants in their bare life, and a way of living out Christian cosmopolitanism.

\textsuperscript{42} At the time of this writing, as immigration laws are constantly changing and being challenged.

John Calvin noted that the whole human race is to be received with charity and to be viewed not in themselves but in God. This echoes the early church’s understanding of seeing Christ in the other, of seeing in others the imago Dei. Hallowing God’s name, as laid out in the Lord’s Prayer, can be demonstrated in hallowing bare life, in standing up for and against all that desecrates God’s name. To hallow, one must see and notice, to honor. Hallowing the suffering and the “bare life” of those on the margins, since they are the imago Dei, is to hallow God’s name. One way the church hallows, or honors God’s name is to involve itself with refugees, as those who bear the image of God. Hallowing can mean “to summon forth” and “to bless or sanctify” and the church can respond to refugees in both ways. The church can welcome immigrants into fellowship and 44 Bretherton, Christianity and Contemporary Politics, 138-139.

46 Ibid., 145.
47 Ibid.
community and can bless them with relationships and support by walking alongside them in mutuality.

For Augustine, the earthly city negotiates peace so that the Gospel can be shared, God can be worshiped, and communion with God happens. This lays the groundwork for human flourishing. Calv in states that all are to be viewed “in God,” meaning that Christian charity is extended to all peoples regardless of distinction. Barth goes further to state that patriotism should not be narrow, but citizens must direct their gaze and energy to the “good of the whole human family.” Writing specifically about the U.K., Anna Rowlands expands on this idea of society seeking the common good, especially in terms of migration and immigration. She highlights how both the political left and right have also used the term “common good” in recent years while neglecting the political foundations in which human flourishing can happen. In a rationalist cosmopolitanism, the genre of tracts called Catéchèse de humanité of the late 18th century, instructed the French public in their duties of brotherhood of mankind, highlighting respect for all of humanity over and above regional loyalty. The duty of care for mankind is not only a Christian trait but one that is esteemed by non-Christian writers as well, and which is seeing a resurgence in rhetoric, even if policies that promote it may be lacking.

48 Bretherton, Christianity and Contemporary Politics, 135.
49 Ibid., 132.
50 Ibid.
52 Bretherton, Christianity and Contemporary Politics, 133.
Review of Relevant Literature on Hospitality

Many have written eloquently on welcome, hospitality, immigration, and the role of the church at these intersections. In Making Room, Pohl approaches hospitality as a way of life fundamental to the Christian identity,\(^{53}\) and her experience was often with people who found themselves at the margins of society. She does not shy away from the difficulties of practicing this type of hospitality, and she offers ideas for how to recover the ancient practice while highlighting communities that are already doing so. Just Hospitality by Russell is a posthumous compilation of her lectures and writings on hospitality based upon her reflections on years of table fellowship.

Joshua Jipp in Saved by Faith and Hospitality\(^{54}\) bases his book on Scripture and the early Christian book of 1 Clement, in which the ancient author makes the claim that Abraham, Lot, and Rahab were saved by both their faith and their hospitality. While this may be a controversial statement today about salvation, it suggests that hospitality is part and parcel of the Christian faith (James 2:14-26; Matthew 7:19-23). Works or faith in action are not salvific but are an outward expression of faith and salvation. The Christian faith is rooted in the hospitable God. Amy Oden’s book And You Welcomed Me\(^{55}\) is a sourcebook on hospitality in the early church that highlights stories and teachings on hospitality and care for strangers from early Christian writers, church fathers, and saints. She uses a wealth of primary texts to make her point about the primacy of hospitality to the early church and her questions for group discussion might be a good resource for small groups.

---

\(^{53}\) Pohl, Making Room, x.
Pope Francis in And You Welcomed Me offers a collection of stories and his sermons on immigration, urging Christians to look at and address the root causes of migration, reminding all that Jesus and his family were refugees in Egypt. Priscilla Sun Kyung Oh in Hospitalable Witnessing understands hospitality as bearing witness to what God is doing, and shares about hospitality from the perspective of friendship amidst mental illness. Edward Smither in Mission as Hospitality seeks to reclaim hospitality as an essential part of Christian missional engagement with the “not-yet people of God” as a way of making room for others while also proclaiming the Gospel.

Ellen Clark Clemot in Discerning Welcome offers a Reformed faith perspective from personal experience in her church extending hospitality and sanctuary to the immigrant. Peter Meilendar in Toward a Theory of Immigration and Luke Bretherton in Christ and the Common Life address theology and immigration from a theological and political perspective. Elizabeth Newman in Untamed Hospitality offers a theological account of hospitality rooted in Christian worship. Luke Bretherton’s Hospitality as Holiness offers hospitality as the shape of Christian witness, which is grounded in Alasdair MacIntyre’s assessment of the contemporary context in conversation with Oliver O’Donovan’s distinctiveness of Christian ethics.

Daniel R. Carroll in The Bible and Borders compiles a comprehensive biblical overview of hospitality throughout the Bible, which is an essential primer to use in a congregational setting or as a small group study with congregants wanting to learn more about what the Bible has to say about immigration. Similarly, Stephan Bauman and co-authors Isaam Simeir and Matthew Soerens, President of World Relief, in Seeking Refuge, seek to equip Christians and churches to be able to address the global refugee crisis and is geared towards a more evangelical audience.

---

There are many other ways in which Christians seek to address the issues of immigration and specifically refugees and asylum seekers from non-profit organizations in many denominations (such as Lutheran Refugee Services and Catholic Charities) to non-government-organizations (International Rescue Committee and the UNHCR are two that are not faith-based), all of whom are great resources and partners in ministry with the asylum seeker. Some churches and denominations operate welcome houses (Welcome House Network and Welcome House Raleigh or the Mennonite Community Hospitality House network and Catholic Worker Houses), while some individual congregations offer their grounds and buildings as sanctuary, a place of refuge and safety from deportation. The short documentary Santuario is a good place to begin exploring how a church might engage in hospitality in this way.

Why the Church Needs Ministry to those on the Margins Like the Asylum Seeker

There is no shortage of books and articles on how the church in North America is on the decline, that we are entering a post-Christian age, and that young people are

---

62 See the promo website, http://www.santuariofilm.com/about. See also Isaac Villegas’s YouTube lecture “Providing Sanctuary as Witness: Standing in Solidarity with Immigrants,” https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mL53HzmQSis. leaving the faith like never before. I have heard concerned elders from “the greatest generation” express dismay and worry about the future of the church for their great-great-grandchildren. Much of the political and ecclesiological rhetoric from evangelicals today is about preserving the declining church. A google search will pull up “save the church in North America” and website after website devoted to this topic. More internet searching will quickly discover five ways and ten ideas, twenty keys, and many more posts about how to “save” the declining church, with evangelists devoted solely to this purpose.
Pollsters, media pundits, pastors, magazines, and news organizations all devote many articles, opinions, and commentaries to this matter.

Society is in the middle of a sea change—a change of culture and values, of environment and climate, of stability—a change of how we get and understand information, and all of this means a change for the church. There is a popular story of a man who was drowning in a flood. He prayed fervently for the Lord to save his life and begged God for mercy and help. Eventually, a boat came by and asked if the man needed help, and the man told the boat captain that he did not need any help because he knew the Lord would save him. It is a common, well-told story. Another boat came by, and then a helicopter came by. All the while the man about to drown told the rescuers no, that he

---

63 Barna Group, “Atheism Doubles among Generation Z,” Barna.com, January 24, 2018, www.barna.com/research/atheism-doubles-among-generation-z. Todd Bolsinger, Canoeing the Mountains:
Christian Leadership in Uncharted Territory (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 2018). See also Ed
Thornton, “What Causes People to Lose Their Faith?” Church Times (March 1, 2019), See also also Robert P. Jones, The End of White Christian America (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2017); Ryan B. Burge, “Only Half of Kids Raised Southern Baptist Stay Southern Baptist,” was waiting on God to rescue him. The story ends with the man drowning, refusing the help that was sent to him by God.

While in San Antonio learning from our sisters and brothers in the faith, of how God was calling them and using them in a ministry of hospitality or justice and mercy with the immigrant, Pastor John Garland prophetically told our group of twenty from the congregation, “The pilgrim church is coming our way; are we willing to receive them?” He challenged our congregation to consider how we might extend hospitality to the asylum seeker—the one who is one of the most vulnerable in society.

After all the talk and prayers about the North American church’s decline, and nones, churches closing their doors, and young people leaving, could it be possible that the very answer to these prayers is the pilgrim church arriving at our border? I am not talking about immigrants adding numbers to declining church attendance. It is the perspective of immigrants, their experiences with God, and their faith that the North American church needs. Christianity is growing in the global south, and it is this church, on the move fleeing persecution and violence, and seeking freedom that is coming to our borders. The North American church has so much to learn from Christians in the global south. They come bringing a tested faith, a daily dependence upon God and a true understanding of suffering and faith that today’s church can benefit from. They could be the very thing that God uses to reinvigorate the North American church. The catch is that Christians must be willing to let them in, to open hearts, homes, lives, and churches to them. Humility is a choice and must be embraced. Todd Bolsinger, in Canoeing the Mountains, describes leadership in the church in this era as “off the map” (post-post-modernity, post-Christendom). It is a time to listen to marginal voices, those who have been silenced, and learn from them. The church is “off the map” navigating uncharted waters of a post-Christendom society and the pilgrim church has come.

---

The North American church risks being like the man in the flood, turning away the boats and the helicopter, not realizing that the boats and the helicopter were God’s ways of answering prayers for rescue. The boats for our rescue may be the pilgrim church knocking on our borders. I in no way want to minimize the great suffering of those seeking refuge and asylum, nor am I suggesting that God has caused this crisis that has led to mass migration. I am offering, however, that in it, God is working, healing, and reconciling. The North American church has an opportunity to experience Christ in this crisis. The people of God have always been a pilgrim people, whose allegiance is to God above and beyond any human or political agenda. Christians have been called by God to deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow Christ (Mark 8:34-35) to the “least of these” (Matthew. 25:34-40). One Central American woman told her pastor, “If I flee and even make it to America, where will I go? Who will help me?” Her pastor told her, “Don’t worry, just get to America, the church will help you.”

Will we? The Spanish-speaking churches along the border are doing extraordinary work in this area along with some small churches in certain pockets. It is work that more of us can do, that we need to do, for our own souls and for the restoration of the church in North America today.

---

65 Bolsinger, Canoeing the Mountains, 189-203.
The church has an opportunity to step out and embrace the pilgrim church at our border. Many of these immigrants come clinging to their faith and their hope in Jesus Christ. They have experienced violence that many of us will never know and yet they still have faith. We have so much to learn from them. Our youngest generations are leaving the faith, often because of issues of hypocrisy, theodicy, and irrelevance. Learning and listening from the pilgrim church just might be the help we need to see afresh the essentials of our faith.

As Bretherton puts it, the “involvement of churches with refugees should be characterized as the hallowing of bare life . . . intrinsic to the command to hallow the name of God (Exodus. 20:1-7).” To hallow means to make holy or set apart. Churches that open themselves to giving and receiving hospitality with asylum seekers are putting into practice the hallowing of God’s name as expressed in the beginning of the Lord’s Prayer: “Our Father, in heaven, hallowed be your name your kingdom come your will be done on earth as it is in heaven” (Matthew 6:9).

Ora et labora is the traditional Benedictine mantra meaning prayer and work. This does not mean pray and then work but rather prayer becomes one’s work and work become one’s prayer. Serving God in our actions is our prayer. This has been a guiding phrase in our congregation for a long time and permeates our hospitality ministry. Ministry with the asylum seeker is one way we worship and participate in God’s inbreaking kingdom on earth. It is an honor and joy to be co-laborers with God in this endeavor. It is work that transforms our own hearts as we meet God in the stranger and

---

66 Bretherton, Christianity and Contemporary Politics, 145.
our lives are changed. As we work, we pray and experience God’s transformation. This is the Benedictine way in action.

Overview of Thesis

In this thesis, I present a formation guide for starting a hospitality house for asylum seekers as a part of a church’s ministry in the community. There are many faithful ways that congregations can engage in hands-on ministry with immigrants and others in need, thus enacting Christ’s instructions in Matthew 25. I describe one way a congregation has sought to greet the stranger as if they are Christ. Since I describe a process for opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers, I use the image and terminology for building a house for the three main chapters. Although we did not literally build a house, we did build a ministry in a house, on land that also needed renewal, as did those who came to the house in search of healing and hope. In many ways, it was an exercise in the reclamation of land and souls, and a stubborn act of hope, trusting that God would show up.

The first of three sections, Chapter 2, “Laying the Foundation,” has two parts that I believe are important theological and ecclesiological preparation for leading a congregation in this type of ministry. For most small and mid-size congregations, embarking upon a ministry of this sort does not just happen overnight. There is a lot of work that needs to happen theologically to even be at the point of willingness to consider opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers. Hospitality ministry to the vulnerable asylum seeker stands on a strong foundation of church history and is an extension of

---

Matthew 25:35 For I was hungry, and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty, and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you invited me in ways, throughout history, in which Christians through the church have sought to deny themselves and follow Christ (Mark 8).

In part one of “Laying the Foundation”, I provide a brief overview of the church’s ministry of mercy, justice, and hospitality, beginning with the early church through the present. This background equips pastors and church leaders to have strong pastoral and theological standing as they lead their congregations.

In the second part, I propose a biblical study and overview of immigration and hospitality throughout the Bible, ending with a section on current events and resources. This is an outline of a basic study through which my congregation journeyed. I did not recreate the in-depth Bible study that is already available on this issue through multiple books and resources but rather provide a possible outline for a study series that the reader can flesh out more clearly to fit the needs of their congregation.

Overall, Chapter 2 addresses the questions, “How do you prepare ministers for a ministry of hospitality?” and “How do you prepare a congregation for a ministry of hospitality?” by looking at theological and educational preparation to lay a strong foundation for a ministry of this sort.

Next, Chapter 3, “Developing Blueprints and Setting the Structure,” describes how we did it. I address vocation and calling and how we structured our hospitality house. I also describe how we trained our congregation for this work.

Finally, Chapter 4, “Maintaining the House,” addresses the challenges and skills that were called forth amidst this endeavor. I do not claim to be a master at this, but I describe our experiences and how we processed them. Humility is a common theme that unites all of what we experienced and tried to practice.
I conclude with a summary and a pastoral and theological reflection on what it means to bear witness to the work of God among us. I apply The Word Made Flesh Model,\(^\text{68}\) which seeks to identify where we were going, what is the lament, and where is the hope.

---

Chapter 2. Laying the Foundation

Anytime one builds a house or a structure, laying the foundation is one of the first steps. It is common knowledge that without a strong and well-laid foundation, a house or building will not withstand the challenges of age and climate. Similarly, a strong foundation is crucial to sensing God’s calling and beginning to put into action a ministry of hospitality.

Following the introduction to “building” a hospitality house in Chapter 1, this and the next two chapters continue the construction metaphor: “Laying the Foundation,” “Beginning and Blueprints,” “Framing and Setting the Structure,” and “Maintaining the House.” In two main parts, “Equipping the Minister” and “Equipping the Congregation,” this chapter addresses the questions, “How do you prepare the ministers for a ministry of hospitality?” and “How do you prepare the congregation for a ministry of hospitality?”

We live in an age of confused, weaponized, and distorted information. Some call it misinformation or multiple truths. Our facts and your facts, your truth and my truth. This is the environment in which churches must learn to navigate and find new ways to extend the loving embrace of God to those on the margins and specifically to the asylum seeker who receives so much disdain. One way we can equip congregations is by remembering our history and the ancient call of Christ and the church to greet the stranger as if they are Christ. The next section seeks to inform and correct misinformed ideas of what the Bible and church history have to say about caring for the outsider.

Part One. Pastoral and Theological Preparation—Equipping the Minister

First is a brief overview of the church’s ministry of mercy, justice, and hospitality beginning with the early church through the present. I address how the church historically has engaged with hospitality and mercy. It provides an essential foundation for the entire endeavor of opening a hospitality house. This historical background equips pastors and church leaders to have strong pastoral and theological standing as they lead their congregations and address the question, “How do you prepare ministers for a ministry of hospitality?”

Hospitality and Mercy to Sufferers: The Church’s Response through History

Church history has much to teach the modern church about ministry and mission, and teaching and making disciples. For many, however, it is easy to overlook the witness of the early church or to dismiss it as being outdated and irrelevant. Nevertheless, the witness of the church throughout time is instructive and can offer great insights into some of the challenges that the global church faces today. Kavin Rowe, in Christianity's Surprise, argues that the early church grew exponentially, in part, due to the ways in which they embraced those who suffered by establishing hospitals and caring for the poor, the sick, the widow, and the orphan. They were able to do this because they faced their own suffering and saw in “the other” the imago Dei. Their understanding of seeing Christ in others was a result of their deep theological training and teaching ministry. Recapturing this understanding can have important implications for the church today and informs how the church can engage in justice ministry. Rowe’s work directly ties the growth of the early church to their engagement with what we might call today social justice ministry as expressly rooted in their understanding of Christ and theology.

---

Additionally, Leo Lefebure in his article on the understanding of suffering in the early church explores how the early church attempted to interpret the origin of suffering. Suffering for the early church became instructive and an opportunity to learn and grow in Christlikeness.

K. C. Richardson in Early Christian Care for the Poor, highlights how the early church learned to embrace their own suffering, empowering them to minister to those who suffer. Not only do these have implications for ministry with those who suffer but also may address the challenge of young adults who are leaving the faith due, in part, to theodicy and the church’s apparent lack of engagement with the real issues of hurting and marginalized people.

Amy Oden, in And You Welcomed Me, recounts a story from the fourth century as told by Palladius, as an example of the many ways the early church taught about hospitality.

_Elias, a hermit living in a cave, received 20 visitors one day. To offer hospitality to these strangers, he went into his cave and saw that he had only a little bit of bread. But Elias fed these strangers, giving all that he had. The remains of the bread were so plentiful that he fed himself on that bread for a month._

---

76 Oden, And You Welcomed Me.

77 Ibid., xx.
In narrative form, this story taught Christians to give plentifully and serve freely, trusting that God will supply the increase and provide for needs as well. Oden’s book is full of excerpts from primary texts from the early church highlighting the idea that the practice of hospitality was essential in the lives of early Christians. Letters and sermons were the common way for the young and growing church to instruct and establish patterns.

_Hospes_, the Latin for hospitality, means welcoming the stranger. Hospitality in the Bible always refers to welcoming the foreigner and extending resources to the alien. Historically, it has been a moral practice but in recent years has been reduced to entertaining. In practicing hospitality, we are de-centered and the focus shifts from self to relationships. While it is a moral discipline, it is not a private discipline but precisely communal. Contrary to our North American individualism that silos off virtue to internal or personal pursuits, hospitality is situated in the _oikos_ of God, or the household of God, in God’s spiritual economy. In early Christian writing, hospitality is always for the poor and the destitute, those without “hearth, home, mattress, bed and possessions” and coupled with almsgiving. These persons were commonly travelers, pilgrims, widows, orphans, slaves, and prisoners, some of whom were destitute due to war.

Tertullian argues with Marcion that the Creator God is the one who feeds the hungry and provides for the poor. Bruce Longenecker in _The Poor of Galatians 2:10_, writes “Tertullian suggests that it is this concern for the poor that causes the gentile nations to be attracted to Christianity.” Christians of the early church were caring for

---

78 Oden, _And You Welcomed Me_. 13.
79 Gregory of Nyssa, sermon, “As You Did It To One of These,” in Oden _And You Welcomed Me_, 22.
the poor with acts of hospitality in such meaningful ways that the larger culture took notice and was intrigued.

By the fourth century, hospitality to the vulnerable became ingrained in the life of the church; it was organized and institutionalized. The Didache and Apostolic Constitutions were teaching tools to help Christians know what it meant to live out their faith. Both set guidelines for the giving and receiving of hospitality. The Didache promised blessings to those who give generously to all, followed by warnings of negative consequences for those who have no mercy for the poor and who do not work on behalf of the oppressed and who turn away from those in need. Mercy and charity were a necessity.81 In the fourth century, Christians were beginning to organize themselves around the sharing of hospitality by establishing structures and institutions to maintain this important ministry. Hospitals and hospices were founded, and safe houses for strangers, widows, and orphans began emerging.

Although the “stranger” and circumstances today may be different, Andy Hogue and Greg Jones in Navigating the Future,82 challenge leaders to learn from tradition and then allow for room for innovation. Their work prepares leaders to expound upon current understandings and practices of leadership. When applied to the Christian discipline of hospitality with the stranger, Christian leaders can easily expand hospitality to include immigrants seeking asylum today.

---

How the Christian Church Changed the View and Response to Suffering

As shown in the following quote, early Christians distinguished themselves from the Greco-Roman world as people expressly interested in the poor. They noticed the poor when the overall culture did not, and when there was disdain for the poor, Christians brought compassion and solidarity. With the emergence of Christianity, a different vision of a just society and life began to emerge. Speaking of Christians, Aristides of Athens writes:

They love one another. They do not neglect widows. Orphans they rescue from those who are cruel to them. Every one of them who has anything gives ungrudgingly to the one who has nothing. If they see a traveling stranger, they bring him under their roof. They rejoice over him as a real brother, for they do not call one another brothers after the flesh, but they know they are brothers in the Spirit and in God . . . If one of them sees that one of their poor must leave this world, he provides for his burial as well as he can. And if they hear that one of them is imprisoned or oppressed by their opponents for the sake of their Christ’s name, all of them take care of all his needs. If possible, they set him free. If anyone among them is poor or comes into want while they themselves have nothing to spare, they fast two or three days for him. In this way they can supply the poor man with the food he needs.

Caring for the poor was uncommon in the pagan ancient world. The Jewish tradition emphasized care for the poor and outcast, but it was with the rise of the Christian faith that society began to change in its care for the least.

paganism was aware of the poor man only in his most commonplace shape, that of the beggar encountered in the street . . . [It] had abandoned without much remorse the starving, the old and the sick . . . . All this changed with the coming of Christianity, in which almsgiving resulted from the new ethical religiosity. . . . Old people’s homes, orphanages, hospitals and so on are institutions that appear only with the Christian epoch.

84 Longenecker, Remember the Poor, 60-61.
85 Ibid., 61.
The Judeo-Christian faith of the early Greco-Roman world began to place in sharp focus the needs of the poor, the outcast, and the stranger. Longenecker argues that the Apostle Paul’s admonitions in both Galatians 2:10 and Romans 12:13 draw attention and praise to the hospitality and care for the poor that these churches were to demonstrate, in contrast to the wider cultural tendencies. Paul urges early Christ-followers to unite around care for the poor, despite their differences. Early Christians began to distinguish themselves from the wider culture, in part, by their care for those who were overlooked.

An Early Christian Understanding of Suffering and Mercy: A Living Catechism

Even more so than now, suffering was a normal but unpleasant part of everyday life for the young and growing church. Christians expected to suffer and did not see it as an anomaly or an interruption. With little medical care, no modern conveniences, harsh living environments, and an age of brutality and rampant injustice, suffering was commonplace. Individuals in society had little control over their lives. Christ-followers did not expect suffering to go away, and therefore understood that their task was to endure. Suffering was not to be avoided. This is so clearly seen in the many Christian martyrs of the early church, who embraced suffering for the sake of their faith in Christ. Jesus Christ in the Gospel of Mark does not glorify suffering or self-sacrifice but initiates God’s kingdom, eventually bringing the overcoming of suffering. Christ alleviated suffering for some and empowered others to do the same. For much of history, suffering was an unpleasant part of being human but normal and expected. In contrast, 87 Mark 8:34 Whoever wants to be my disciple must deny himself, take up his cross and follow me.

---

Western culture today sees suffering as abnormal or an aberration. Our culture today provides untold numbers of remedies to physical ailments and seems to be fixated on protecting and insulating. Understanding how the early church viewed suffering is part of learning how they cared for and responded to the suffering of others.

Justin Martyr (100–165) noted the distinction that Christ-followers live as “aliens” or sojourners in the land while also seeking the best for others in their respective places. While the author is unknown, the following is dated to the same time period in what is called the Epistle to Diognetus:

For Christians are not distinguished from other people by country, or language or custom. Nowhere do they live in cities of their own, or speak a strange dialect, or live life in a peculiar way . . . they live in their respective countries, but only as resident aliens; they participate in all things as citizens, and they endure all things as foreigners. Every foreign country is their homeland, and every homeland is foreign.

Augustine of Hippo built on the above mentioned Didache and created what he called a catechetical approach to Christian maturity, which was a lifelong process of growing, learning, and engaging the truths of the Christian story for the continual formation and transformation of individuals and communities. Furthermore, in “Catechesis, Mystagogy, and Pedagogy” Beverly Johnson-Miller and Benjamin Espinoza emphasize the spiritual formation component of Christian teaching and instruction and note that “Catechesis is the process of leading others to embrace and be embraced by the love of God.” Spiritual formation always has an external expression of the internal mystery of God’s work in the Christian’s life. For Augustine, formation in Christ’s love is an inward experience that manifests itself outwardly in sharing and leading others to the loving embrace of God. Essentially, catechesis is to be lived out in everyday life as we manifest and extend the loving embrace of God. Augustine was chiefly concerned with the “golden thread” of the two-fold love of God and love of neighbor. These were inseparable and present in all aspects of teaching presented to new converts in North Africa in the early fifth century. Catechesis for Augustine was not just about disseminating information, but it was also about spiritual formation of the soul that unites one with the transforming love of God.91 This transforming love of God always has an outward expression.

---

89 From the Epistle to Diognetus; quoted in George Kalantzis, Caesar and the Lamb (Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2012), 86.

Further, for fourth century Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, the Christian faith journey originates in and leads into the mystery of God’s infinite love. Cyril wrote five homilies that defined mystagogic catechesis as a life to be lived, not a doctrine to be defended or a theological ascent.92

The “Man of God” hagiographical literature recounts stories of a deeply devout man who rejected his inherited wealth and took a vow of poverty. One version in particular, the Life of the Man of God, is different from other common ascetic stories. It held much weight and influence in the fifth-century church in the port city of Edessa, part of the Byzantine Empire. It drew attention to the ideal Christ-follower whom all should emulate. In this version, the devout man performs no miracles and is not especially ascetic or penitential. His one extolling virtue is that he lived a life in solidarity with the poor and the foreigner. As he was dying, he was taken to the hospital for ill strangers and was buried among the paupers. Stories of the “Man of God” captivated the minds of Christians and inspired them to care for the poor as they were visible manifestations of Christ. It is also interesting to note that by the fifth century, there were hospitals for the poor and the stranger. Eventually, the stories of this man of God who cared for the poor became linked with the name of St. Alexius.93

Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 335–395) of Cappadocia, is the younger brother of Basil of Caesarea and was good friends with Gregory of Nazianzen (all known as the Cappadocian Fathers). In his homily, “As you did it to one of the least of these you did it to me,” Nyssa urged Christians to see the sick and the hungry as one sent by Christ and to put on the “yoke of love.”94 He likened teaching the faithful the rudiments of knowledge to a teacher instructing children in the essentials of writing and pronunciation. For him, abstinence is a spiritual state of mind that examines the soul’s relationship with sin. A state of abstinence yields self-control regarding food, clothing, one’s relationship with money, and more.95 Abstaining from excess creates room for generosity of time, money, and possessions.

Nyssa goes on to implore Christians to “assist these people (the poor, the starving in the streets, those who have no home and food, the leper, the ill and outcast), you who practice abstinence. Be generous on behalf of your unfortunate brethren.”96 Their ability and desire to extend mercy is linked with their discipline and abstinence. Nyssa

94 Oden, And You Welcomed Me, 58.
95 Susan Holman, The Hungry are Dying: Beggars and Bishops in Roman Cappadocia (New York: Oxford CP, 2001), 194.
96 Holman, The Hungry are Dying, 195.
understood that Christians have something to learn from the poor, for “[t]he poor are stewards of our hope, doorkeepers of the kingdom, who open the door to the righteous and close it again to the unloving and misanthropists.” Since serving the poor and afflicted embodies serving Christ, Nyssa implores all who follow Christ to remember him as they serve, because the Lord of the angels, the king of celestial bliss, became man for you and put on this stinking and unclean flesh, with the soul thus enclosed, in order to effect a total cure of your ills by his touch . . . remember who you are and who you contemplate: a human person like yourself, whose basic nature is no different from your own . . . treat all therefore as one common reality.

Not only should Christians serve the poor because they are like Christ, but Christians serve out of obedience and in doing so will reap a harvest of blessings. For Nyssa, each human being is an image of God and this understanding of the imago Dei influenced his opposition of slavery, “a stand that made him unique and countercultural in his time.”

In an effort to arouse believers’ passions and compassion in giving aid to those who suffer, both Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory of Nazianzen describe in detail the different ailments and predicaments that may befall one who is destitute.

Gregory of Nazianzus explains in Oration 14 how all virtues are admirable and praiseworthy, but the greatest is active love for victims of misfortune, for each human being bears God’s image. Practicing excess leads to a sickness of the soul and the only remedy is to “follow the Logos by learning temperance.”

---

97 Holman, The Hungry are Dying, 196.
98 Ibid., 201.
99 Ibid., 202.
102 Tobon, “The Normativity of Measure in Gregory Nazianzus’ and Gregory of Nyssa’s Orations,” 245.
103 Ibid., 246.
neglected is a preventative treatment for the sickness of the soul. It is both mandatory for the Christian and in one’s best interest because to minister to the leper is to minister to Christ himself. Humans need this remedy to the excesses of the soul.

The relationship between theology and social ethics in the form of poverty relief continued into the fourth century. The Cappadocian Fathers helped highlight the invisible poor by locating them within the sphere of God’s creation. Holman describes their contribution: “Basil and the Gregories give meaning to the poor by placing them within the liturgical concepts of emerging Christian culture.”104 Furthermore, John Chrysostom (ca. 347–407), the great preacher in Constantinople, posits that almsgiving is the remedy for healing sickly souls. Not only is there benefit to the poor in giving but it also benefits the giver and is a part of their spiritual healing. Almsgiving was a discipline necessary for healthy spirituality.105

Furthermore, Chrysostom urges Christians to embrace their identity as pilgrims or sojourners on their way to God’s heavenly city. For him and early Christians, identifying as one without place or home contributed to the acceptance of sharing hospitality with the sojourner and caring for the destitute. For Chrysostom, the idea of hospitality is grounded in one’s Christian identity. Cyril of Jerusalem defined mystagogic catechesis as a life to be lived, not a doctrine to be defended; it was about Christ-centered living and practices.106 Teaching was for formation in a way that yielded faith in action. There was no division between private devotion to God and acts of social ministry.

104 Holman, “Conclusion: Between Courtyard and Altar,” in The Hungry are Dying.
105 Junghun Bae, John Chrysostom: on Almsgiving and the Therapy of the Soul, (Paderborn: Ferdinand Schöningh Verlag, 2021).
Writings and teaching originating in the early church are replete with instruction on caring for the poor, the stranger, and the outcast, and sharing hospitality with others as if they are Christ himself. 107 For the early church, orthodoxy necessarily led to orthopraxy; there was no distinction between the two. To be a Christ-follower meant to share one’s life in ministry in the kind of ways that Christ did while on this earth. Christians were found with orphans, the infirm, the outcast, the stranger, and the sinner, addressing suffering where possible, extending hospitality, and leading all to the hope and good news of God’s redeeming love.

In Genesis we learn that God created humanity in the “image of God,” the imago Dei. Christians took this seriously in the blossoming early church. They learned to see the face of Christ in the poor and the suffering, the orphan, widow and the sick. Because of the resurrection, they learned to not fear death in contrast to the self-preservation of their culture. They accepted that to be human is to get sick and to die. Their preparation for suffering involved teachings on learning and growing in suffering and empowered them to go to the suffering. Like firefighters running into a burning building, Christians “ran” to the plague victims during two major plagues of the time.

During the Cyprian Plague in the third century (which was the second major plague) St. Dionysius of Alexandria witnessed the pagan reaction to the plague:

At the first onset of the disease, they pushed the sufferers away and fled from their dearest, throwing them into the roads before they were dead and treating unburied corpses as dirt, hoping thereby to avert the spread and contagion of the fatal disease; but do what they might, they found it difficult to escape.108

Conversely, Cyprian of Carthage noted Christians’ different approach:

Most of our brother Christians showed unbounded love and loyalty, never sparing themselves and thinking only of one another. Heedless of danger, they took charge of the sick, attending to their every need and ministering to them in Christ, and with them departed this life serenely happy; for they were infected by others with the disease, drawing on themselves the sickness of their neighbors and cheerfully accepting their pains. Many, in nursing and curing others, transferred their death to themselves and died in their stead.\(^{109}\)

Julian the Apostate also noted that Christians’ care for the poor, and their compassion and service, were recognized as part of the ascendancy of the church. He sought to encourage Roman pagans to service of the poor, to no avail.\(^{110}\) Wherever there was suffering, where people were overlooked, despised, and discarded, Christians were there, serving others as if they were Christ. They beautifully modeled “[t]hose who want to save their life must lose it, those who lose their life for my sake will find it” (Matthew 16:25, Mark 8:34-9:1, Luke 9:23-27).

Kavin Rowe describes how suffering is actually an important component of thriving Christian communities, drawing inspiration from the early church’s understanding of suffering. He also cautions against drawing conclusions that all suffering serves some larger Christian purpose.\(^{111}\) For the early church, facing suffering and sharing hospitality gave life and invigorated the lives of Christians in the first centuries.

\(^{110}\) Kavin Rowe, Christianity’s Surprise: A Sure and Certain Hope (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2020) 35.

Middle Ages and Reformation

The church during the Middle Ages addressed suffering and care for those who suffer in multiple ways, as seen in part of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, 7 Spiritual and 7 Corporal Works of Mercy.\(^\text{112}\) This and other writings of the mystics linked care for others with one’s own suffering. Images of the works of mercy were often depicted through art, some of the most well-known of which are Caravaggio’s altarpiece in Naples and Master of Alkmaar’s polyptych in Amsterdam.

Considered the last of the church fathers, Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153) wrote The Love of God, describing God’s four degrees of deep and abiding love. In the first degree of love, he challenges that the only way to be able to love one’s neighbors as ourselves with “absolute righteousness” is first to love God, the source of all goodness.\(^\text{113}\) Clairvaux noted the connection between one’s suffering and one’s ability to love and comfort others’ suffering as Christ did,

> The sound person feels not the sick one’s pains, nor the well-fed the pangs of the hungry. It is fellow sufferers that readily feel compassion for the sick and the hungry . . . [y]ou will never have real mercy for the failings of another until you know and realize that you have the same failings in your soul.\(^\text{114}\)

Moreover, Clairvaux attests that discipline of appetites (not just from food, but from excess) frees one to love one’s neighbor more fully and to give to those in need, trusting that God’s love will supply one with adequate love to share.\(^\text{115}\)

\(^{115}\) Gaultiere, “Four Degrees.”
Living during the plague of the Black Death, mystic Julian of Norwich (1342–1416) wrote about the suffering of Christ and how his suffering envelopes or cradles those who suffer. In Revelations of Divine Love, she focused on Christ’s suffering which was borne out of his great love for humanity. She wrote out of her own experience with suffering and the loss of loved ones. While she may not have urged others to alleviate the sufferings of others, she did urge solidarity with Christ in suffering.

In her seminal work, Dialogue in 1377-78, Catherine of Siena wrote practical encouragement in a time of cultural and ecclesial chaos. She devoted her life to serving the poor and the sick, penning, “I have told you how every sin is done by means of your neighbors because it deprives them of your loving charity, and it is charity that gives life to all virtue. So that selfish love which deprives your neighbors of your charity and affection is the principle and foundation of all evil.” Neglecting to show mercy and charity to one’s neighbor is seen as the root of depravity. Siena urged others to serve the suffering, just as she practically demonstrated this devotion in her daily life of service extending mercy. Contemporaries, both Norwich and Siena urged Christ-followers to see the suffering of Christ as a sign of God’s immense love for humanity.

In Obligations of Mercy, Thomas Aquinas exhorted that Christians are bound to their neighbors and thus their suffering. He defines mercy as a compassionate concern for those who suffer hardship or grievous loss that compels one to comfort the afflicted. Mercy or misericordia means “compassionate heart.” Charity is a result of God’s divine grace, a byproduct of God’s work of love and grace in our lives. For Aquinas, loving God means loving that which God loves. Human beings who bear the image of God then are objects of charity. Charity, for Aquinas, must include love for all that God loves, and each human uniquely bears God’s image. Loving one’s neighbor is how one loves God. Conversely, when our neighbor suffers, because we love our neighbor, we also suffer.\(^{117}\)

---

Luther wrote catechetical teachings based upon faith, hope, and love, which are expressed in love of God and love of others. The point of catechesis was holy living as a way of embodying the Christian life.\(^{118}\) The spiritual life was to be demonstrated in daily life in interactions with others. Luther had a broad view of catechesis in which the spiritual life was embodied.\(^{119}\) Johnson-Miller and Espinoza write that the “Reformers warned against catechesis becoming an exercise in rote memorization and examination to the detriment of genuine interaction with people and ideas.”\(^{120}\) It was a lifelong process of spiritual formation and sanctification. Orthopraxy, or right practice, was the broader goal for Christian education and teaching.

Modernity

The Protestant Reformation gave rise to critiques of the established Catholic Church. As newly formed Protestant churches organized and mobilized for ministry, preachers exhorted their congregants to care for the poor and the stranger. Charity and social religion were common terms for this type of outward engagement of the church in ministry with the world in need. In an address on the anniversary meeting of charity schools in London on June 5, 1718, pastors William Lupton and Joseph Downing based their encouragement to extend love and charity to neighbor on the example laid by the early church.\textsuperscript{121} Humanity’s primary aim is the glorification of God and the subsequent aim, in service to the primary, is engaging in “positive duties of charity.” They go on to cite that trees bearing bad fruit should be cut down as well as those trees that bear no fruit at all. Indifference to sharing charity and goodness with one’s neighbor is as bad as a tree that bears bad fruit. Both the stagnant tree and the tree with bad fruit are to be cut down and thrown into the fire.\textsuperscript{122} For these Protestants, charity and good works were part of glorifying God and the Christian witness.

---

\(^{120}\) Ibid., 160.

Not long after Lupton and Downing’s ministry, in the city of Oxford, England, churches dissenting from the Church of England were beginning to form. In 1780, Daniel Turner, a dissenting pastor, urged newly forming Baptist churches to put on charity, which he affirmed is more than just kindness to the poor. It is the love of God shed abroad in hearts, extending mercy and loving-kindness, prompting Christians to do the greatest good for society. “Christian Charity is infinitely more than mere good-nature of that benevolence . . . it is indeed, the sum of all religion—Christianity in Epitome.”\textsuperscript{123} Serving and ministering with the world in need and extending mercy and love to one’s neighbor was an essential manifestation of God’s love in these emerging, dissenting Baptist churches.

\textsuperscript{122} Lupton and Downing, \textit{The Necessity of Positive Duty}, 17-19.

The abolitionist movement in both England and America often was led by Christians who grounded their opposition to slavery based upon their faith and understanding of God. One of these writers was an early Baptist layperson, Susanna Watts of Leicester England, who wrote hymns, pamphlets, and a book in the late eighteenth century. She contributed to The Hummingbird, an anti-slavery publication, mostly written by women. Although these women writers did not sign their writings, we know that Susanna Watts and Elizabeth Heyrick collaborated together to appeal to both women and men, on behalf of their Christian faith, to do everything in their power to stop the slave trade, end slavery, and promote freedom. Phrases like “dare we to alledge that Divine mercy is only for the white man?” and “the work of emancipating the Africans is, therefore, a Christian work” are found throughout their work in The Humming Bird. In it Watts describes her efforts for an immediate cessation of the slave trade (as opposed to a gradual abolition) as a divine campaign.

124 The Humming Bird or Morsels of Information, on the Subject of Slavery with various Miscellaneous Articles. Leicester, England: A Cockshaw (1825). https://www.google.co.uk/books/edition/The_Humming_bird_or_Morsels_of_informati/FL4PAAAAAIAJ?hl=en&gbpv=1

126 “Address to the Ladies of Great-Britain in Behalf of the Negro-Slaves,” The Humming Bird 1, n. 7 (June, 1825): 201, https://www.google.co.uk/books/edition/The_Humming_bird_or_Morsels_of_informati/FL4PAAAAAIAJ?hl=en&gbpv=1.

127 “The Illegality of the Slave Trade,” The Humming Bird 1 (Dec. 1824), https://www.google.co.uk/books/edition/The_Humming_bird_or_Morsels_of_informati/FL4PAAAAAIAJ?hl=en&gbpv=1

In addition to her written work in pamphlets and in The Humming Bird on the immediate abolition of slavery, Watts also wrote about and campaigned on care for the poor and the elderly. These causes were based in her faith and appealed to the Christian to extend friendship with those on the margins of life, especially slaves. She appealed to classical, scriptural, and philosophical texts to make her case against slavery.\(^{129}\) Both lay and pastoral Christians continued the tradition of the church’s ministry to the poor and the neglected, seeking to share Christian charity in meaningful ways with society.

At times throughout history, the church has responded to crises of justice with courageous positions undergirded by strong theological teaching. The Barmen Confession was penned by the Confessing Church in Nazi Germany with the help of Karl Barth and was a response to how the church in Germany was aligning itself with the government and thus becoming complicit in its atrocities.\(^{130}\) Although this confession is not a catechism in the traditional sense, it is a theological statement, a part of catechesis and meant to instruct the church. Dietrich Bonhoeffer\(^{131}\) addressed the pervasive suffering that surrounded him in Nazi Germany by calling on Christians to stand with God in the hour of God’s grieving for the poor and oppressed.\(^{132}\) Both Barth and Bonhoeffer, called the church to confront the suffering and injustices of their time. Some, like Craig Nessan, have critiqued the Barmen Declaration for being “myopic” and failing to intercede for oppressed and suffering neighbors\textsuperscript{133} by focusing too much on the church’s own welfare to the detriment of the welfare of neighbors. Bonhoeffer boldly proclaimed that Christians should advocate for just laws, give aid to victims of government injustice and exercise civil disobedience when legal channels fail.\textsuperscript{134} For Nessan, the Barmen Declaration did not go far enough.

---

\(^{129}\) James and Shuttleworth, “Susanna Watts and Elizabeth Heyrick, 1820–34.”

Similarly, the Belhar Confession was forged in the time of apartheid in South Africa as a theological statement to guide and challenge the church.\textsuperscript{135} Structured like the Barmen Declaration, it has three main components: unity, reconciliation and justice with biblical affirmation and a rejection of false teaching, stating: “any teaching which attempts to legitimate such forced separation by appeal to the gospel, and is not prepared to venture on the road of obedience and reconciliation, but rather, out of prejudice, fear, selfishness and unbelief, denies in advance the reconciling power of the gospel, must be considered ideology and false doctrine.” \textsuperscript{136} This is another example of the church responding to crises of justice by correcting bad theology that had contributed to complicity in racism. It demonstrates how confessional affirmations can arise from social ethics and social situations.

\textsuperscript{134} Nessan, “Barmen Declaration.” See also Bonhoeffer, “The Church and the Jewish Question.”
Today, some have called for the church to consider a new declaration to address the many societal injustices and to spur her to action. Theologian James Cone, pastor Martin Luther King Jr, and activist Fannie Lou Hamer were among many Black Christians who prophetically called the church in America to repentance and into solidarity with the suffering of African Americans. Saint Oscar Romero and Pope Francis, to name a few, have challenged the worldwide church through their own work and writings to address the needs of the suffering and to stand in solidarity and advocacy with immigrants and refugees. While there is no new theological declaration for the 21st century that addresses the social challenges and theological deficits of our era, there are voices speaking into the challenges of church and culture.

Dorothy Day, co-founder of the Catholic Worker movement exemplified “hallowing” of bare life by paying intense attention to the suffering poor. The Catholic Worker movement stresses gentle personalism (the idea that every person is unique and has intrinsic value) establishing hospitality houses for relief for those in need. Day’s journals and writings chronicled the mundane challenges of community life in the hospitality houses and in the ministry. Understanding that each person bears the image of Christ was a foundational principal for her, as this journal entry from December 1945 notes:

If we hadn’t got Christ’s own words for it, it would seem raving lunacy to believe that if I offer a bed and food and hospitality to some man or woman or child, I am

---

138 Other current resources about suffering include Karen Kilby and Rachel Davies, eds., Suffering and the Christian Life (London: T&T Clark, 2020), and many books by John Swinton on faith, suffering, mental illness, dementia, and theology.
139 For more information https://www.sistersoftheroad.org/mission-and-philosophy#:~:text=Gentle%20personalism%20stresses%20the%20idea,them%20room%20to%20be%20whole.
replaying the part of Lazarus or Martha or Mary, and that my guest is Christ. There is nothing to show it, perhaps. There are no halos already glowing around their heads – at least none that human eyes can see. It is not likely that I shall be vouchsafed the vision of Elizabeth of Hungary, who put the leper in her bed and later, going to tend him, saw no long the leper’s stricken face, but the face of Christ. The part of a Peter Clever, who gave a stricken Negro his bed and slept on the floor at his side, is more likely to be ours. For Peter Clever never saw anything with his bodily eyes except the exhausted black faces of the Negroes, he had only faith in Christ’s own words that these people were Christ. And when on one occasion the Negroes he had induced to help him ran from the room, panic-stricken before the disgusting sight of some sickness, he was astonished. “You musn’t go,” he said, and you can still hear his surprise that anyone could forget such a truth: “You mustn’t leave him – it is Christ.”

140

Throughout the history of the church, there has been a nearly constant presence of dedicated church leaders who have sought to model and teach the importance of extending mercy and justice to the suffering. Church leaders have done this through writing and teaching, through preaching and exhortation, and through their very lived examples of selflessness and service to the overlooked and forgotten.

Examples of Hospitality and Mercy and Justice

In many ways throughout history, Christians have led society by tending to the sick, poor, orphans, widows, and sojourners by establishing hospitals and orphanages and by opening their homes to those without a place to stay. Monasteries and convents have always been places of refuge and safety for the vulnerable. Most recently in the twentieth century during World War II, many European convents and monasteries hid Jews from the Nazi regime. The Huguenot village of Le Chambón, in France also offered sacrificial hospitality and refuge. Their risky and bold practice of selflessness was directly tied not only to their faith but also to their experience with suffering and persecution. They were acquainted with suffering and thus had compassion for the suffering.

The underground railroad in America during the era of slavery was largely run by Christian abolitionists who risked their lives and families to help African American slaves escape to freedom. Today, hospitality houses can encompass many expressions and can be found across the nation and world as places where pilgrims can find rest and safety. Some hospitality houses offer a free place to stay while loved ones seek treatments in a hospital or a place of respite for those visiting the incarcerated. Hospitality homes can provide for adults with disabilities or teen mothers or serve as halfway houses for those in recovery. Catholic Worker houses have long had footprints in communities bringing light and hope in forgotten neighborhoods. Hospitality or welcome houses help refugees and immigrants adjust to life in America, often providing short term housing. Catholic Charities Immigration and Refugee Services and Lutheran Refugee Services often work with welcome houses as they support refugees during resettlement. All of these are examples of hospitality providing refuge for a vulnerable population.

Anna Rowlands cites inspiration from Simone Weil and Pope Francis as she exhorts Christians to see suffering and stare it in the face. She challenges others to pay extreme attention to the suffering, and to attend to the material world instead of retreating and pulling away from the difficult parts of being human. Rowlands describes prioritizing 142 For more information, see “About the Catholic Worker Movement,” https://catholicworker.org/about-the-catholic-worker-movement/.

---

being with immigrants rather than doing for them and creating a community of mutuality and reciprocity with refugees in a way that re-dignifies.

Part Two. Educational Preparation—Equipping the Congregation

This section addresses the preparation of our congregation in discernment of starting a hospitality house. Following is a proposed biblical study and overview of immigration and hospitality throughout the Bible that concludes with a section on current events and resources. This is an outline of a basic study through which my congregation journeyed. Through this study, Christians will see what Pohl asserts, that “Hospitality is not optional for Christians . . . it is a necessary practice in the community of faith.”

An in-depth Bible study is already available on this issue in The Bible and Borders by Dan Carroll. This study draws on some of his work and addresses questions such as the following, “What is the biblical view of hospitality?” “What can we learn from Scripture and the early church about the ‘stranger’ among us?” and “How can we prepare for ministry with immigrants?” There are over 100 texts in the Old and New Testaments that speak to outsiders, immigrants, and the stranger or sojourner. There are at least twenty-four specific texts on welcoming the stranger and fifty-eight passages more broadly on justice and mercy. The Bible has a lot to say about how we treat the most vulnerable among us in direct admonition and through narrative story as you will see below. This is an overview that can be tailored to fit specific congregational contexts and needs.

A Congregational Study Outline

Below is a suggested outline that a congregation can use to develop their own programming to address the needs of their particular context. Possible discussion questions are included in an appendix at the end.

Key Questions for Proposed Study:
- What is the Biblical view of hospitality?
- What can we learn from Scripture and the early church about the “stranger”?
- What is our vocation/calling as the people of God?
- How can we prepare for ministry with immigrants?

Overview/Outline of A Proposed Study

1) Viewing the Old Testament through the lens of migration
   Week 1: Sarai and Abram and messengers, sojourner in OT
            Levitical codes, Prophets
   Week 2: Exile in Egypt, wandering and return,
            Displaced people, God accompanied/guided refugees
   Week 3: Ruth and Naomi

2) The New Testament and hospitality
   Week 4: Emmaus, Matt. 25, Paul, Jesus
            1 Peter written to those in exile.
            Sojourner in NT
   Week 5: Mary as the ultimate act of hospitality

3) Early church and church history
   Week 6: Understanding outsider and sojourner; justice and mercy

4) The current situation
   Week 7: Who are our mission partners?
            CBF Immigration Advocacy, FSW, Lutheran RS, Catholic Charities, World Relief
            How are churches responding to this crisis? Give Examples:
            Short-term shelters, food, clothing, opening homes
   Week 8: Why are people fleeing Central America and other areas?
What is the role of US Policy in recent immigration and destabilization of the region?

5) Compile a team to develop resources for future training
   • Compile Trauma Informed Care resources
   • Compile a Resource Guide & Asset Map
   • Determine other models to learn from

For many of the sections above, there are beautiful images of art and music that can creatively illustrate these passages and engage the learner on different levels. One way to frame this study is within the context of caring for God’s creation. Liturgical churches that follow the church calendar observe a Season of Creation in the fall,145 which leads congregations to consider how they steward and care for all of God’s creation. This proposed study moves beyond caring for the material earth to all that God has created, including our fellow human. Our church observes a Season of Justice and Peace bookended by Juneteenth and July 4. These natural dates in the national calendar provide opportunities to explore peace and justice and that which has been denied, specifically regarding race, which makes it a good time to engage this study.

Viewing the Old Testament through the Lens of Migration

Issues related to migration play prominent roles in such biblical books as Genesis, Leviticus, Joshua, Judges, Isaiah, the Psalms, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Esther, Ruth, Acts, and 1 Peter. The issue of migration figures prominently in the Bible, occurring in every genre from Torah to the epistles.146 This study presents an overview of

145 https://seasonofcreation.org/
Scripture and migration, any one of the texts could be used for a deeper dive that would be instructive and illuminating.

The people of God have a long history of meeting God in the foreigner and also being the foreigner who needs help from God. Sarai and Abram entertained sojourners who were messengers in Genesis 18:1-15. Their hospitality to these strangers yielded a surprising revelation from God and a blessing. Because of famine, the people of God were settlers who became slaves in the land of Egypt, enduring hardship, genocide, and oppression. The story of God’s people wandering in the desert, fleeing an oppressive regime is central to the entire biblical story. In today’s era of modern migration to the southern border of the U.S., it is strikingly similar that migrants cross the desert fleeing violence, seeking freedom. In the story of God liberating the Israelites, God accompanies them on their journey as a pillar of cloud by day and fire by night. Both in Scripture and in our current situation of migration, we understand God as one who companions those suffering, including the asylum seeker and all who seek safety and refuge in a new land.

Throughout Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy (Exodus 10:17-21, Deuteronomy 10:19, and Leviticus 19:18), God reminds God’s people to extend care and hospitality to those who have little and to the foreigner, reminding them that they once were foreigners and sojourners.147 Later after being settled in their land for hundreds of years, displacement hits the people of God again, as they are forced to flee in exile from their own land and live in a new country under the rule of foreign kings. This Babylonian captivity lasted almost 60 years and is described in the book of Jeremiah. The identity of the Old Testament people of God is often one of a sojourner—seeking place and stability,

---

147 Leviticus 25:23 “you reside in my land as foreigners and strangers.”
fleeing oppression, and living under oppression. Through it all, God is with them, challenging them, calling them back, accompanying them in grief and in journey.

In Scripture, God is depicted as the divine host, providing manna and quail in the wilderness and setting a table in Psalm 23, culminating with God’s banqueting table in Revelation 19:7. The prophets have much to say about justice and how society treats the poor. Isaiah proclaims the year of the Lord’s favor in Isaiah 61, the same passage that Jesus read to inaugurate his ministry (see also Isaiah 58:6-10, 1:16-17, Jeremiah 22:3). The kind of fast that God desires, is not one of abstaining from food but one of seeking justice by providing food for the hungry and shelter for those who wander. In this, the prophet Isaiah describes that this type of justice-seeking is pleasing to God. Isaiah 61 refers to the Jubilee year and Leviticus 25, which is designed to keep Israelites from falling into debt and servitude which would place them at risk for becoming migrants themselves. The Jubilee year restores family land and forgives debt, equalizing the haves and haves-not.

The wisdom literature of Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes extoll the virtue of seeking justice for the oppressed (Psalm 10:17, 82:3-4, 103:6, 140:12, 146:5-9, Proverbs 21:3). These passages urge the people of God to pay attention to the poor and the oppressed as a central part of what it means to live a life of worshipping God. The Old Testament clearly instructs on the subject of foreigners or aliens in Leviticus, in not 148 See again Leviticus 25:23 where God is the host of the land, the people of God are strangers and foreigners.

149 Leviticus 19:33-34 “When an alien resides with you in your land, you shall not oppress the alien. The alien who resides with you shall be to you as the citizen among you; you shall love the alien as yourself, for you were aliens in the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God.”
depriving justice in Deuteronomy\textsuperscript{150} and not oppressing the alien in Ezekiel.\textsuperscript{151} Zechariah\textsuperscript{152} exhorts God’s people to show kindness and mercy and Malachi warns against pushing aside the alien.\textsuperscript{153} For each of these passages from the Old Testament, a leader or teacher could spend weeks of study to help congregants identify with the sojourner and with God’s call of care for the oppressed. As demonstrated, texts related to migration occur in the Law, the Prophets, and in wisdom literature showing God’s heart for the marginalized. The theme of hospitality runs throughout the Old Testament, which continues without interruption in the New Testament.

The New Testament and Hospitality

Building upon the identity of sojourner and pilgrim from the Old Testament, the gospels present Jesus and the holy family as a continuation of this motif. Joseph, Mary, and Jesus must sojourn to Bethlehem to please the empire and search for shelter as pregnant Mary gives birth. Our Christmas carol Away in a Manger reminds us of this story, “no room for a bed.” After the birth of Christ, the family must flee violence in the middle of the night for their safety, seeking refuge in Egypt. Many of the asylum seekers coming to our border also have fled in the middle of the night with nothing more than the clothes in their backpacks. In seeing Jesus as the divine migrant, God chooses to identify with all of those who seek refuge, fleeing violence (Matthew 2:13-18). After Herod’s \textsuperscript{150} Deuteronomy 24:7 You shall not deprive a resident alien or an orphan of justice, see also 27:19.

\textsuperscript{151} Ezekiel 22:29 “The people of the land have practiced extortion and committed robbery; they have oppressed the poor and needy and have extorted from the alien without redress.”
\textsuperscript{152} Zechariah 7:9-10 “Thus says the Lord of hosts: Render true judgments, show kindness and mercy to one another; do not oppress the widow, the orphan, the alien, or the poor; and do not devise evil in your hearts against one another.”
\textsuperscript{153} Malachi 3:5 “I will be swift to bear witness against the sorcerers, against the adulterers, against those who swear falsely, against those who oppress the hired workers in their wages, the widow, and the orphan, against those who thrust aside the alien, and do not fear me, says the Lord of hosts.”
death, they wanted to return to Bethlehem, but Archelaus was in charge, so they went north to Galilee, which still was not safe (Matthew 2:21-23).

Not only does the holy family exemplify and continue the motif of immigrant and sojourner, but Mary, the mother of Jesus, typifies the ultimate act of hospitality. Upon learning that she was carrying the son of God in her womb, she replied, “Let it be to me according to your word” (Luke 1:38). She embodied hospitality by opening her heart and giving of her life and body for the work of the Lord. She embodied kenosis, a pouring out of herself, a relinquishment of power, control and will in service to God. Her act of submission to the will of God by hosting the Holy baby within her body is the greatest example of hospitality among humanity. Because of Mary’s hospitality, of saying yes to God – sacrificially hosting God, she was the first to learn and understand the meaning of Jesus and his life. Mary, exemplifying Simone Weil’s practice of paying deep attention,\textsuperscript{154} contemplates the work of God in her life.\textsuperscript{155} Mary’s open hospitality to Almighty God led to hosting the Christ child and to Mary’s deep contemplation on the love of God that she experienced. In her deep attention to God, Mary recognizes God as the hope for all who suffer, as expressed in the Magnificat.\textsuperscript{156}

John 1:14 says, “the word became flesh and dwelt [tabernacled] among us,” meaning God pitched his tent with us, referencing the days of Israel’s wandering in the wilderness. In both Matthew 8:20 and Luke 9:58, Jesus said the “Son of man has nowhere to lay his head,” reinforcing Jesus as the divine migrant who sojourns with us. Not only did he journey with us, but per the Isaiah 61:1 prophecy that he fulfilled, he

\begin{footnotes}
\item \textsuperscript{154} Rowlands, “The Politics of the Common Good,” 70.
\item \textsuperscript{155} Luke 2:19 “Mary treasured up all these things and pondered them in her heart.”
\item \textsuperscript{156} Luke 1:46-55.
\end{footnotes}
specifically came for the population of the oppressed and brokenhearted. In Matthew 11:3-5, the climax is Jesus’ response to the disciple of John the Baptist that good news is preached to the poor. It is even more important than the dead being raised, also echoing Isaiah 61. Jesus is at the beginning of his ministry and foretells what the focus of his ministry will be as well: good news for the poor. Similarly in Luke 4:16-30 Jesus reads from the scroll of Isaiah and proclaims the year of the Lord’s welcome, preaching good news to the poor, freedom for prisoners, sight to the blind, the oppressed are set free, and the year of God’s favor, highlighting his concern for those on the margins of society.

Throughout the gospels, Jesus seeks out those who are on the margins of life, the outcast woman,\(^\text{157}\) the sick and the lame, and the despised tax collector, each time imparting dignity and sharing hospitality. Christ accompanies the brokenhearted on the road to Emmaus, and eyes are opened in the breaking of bread. Table fellowship and hospitality is a common theme that is also highlighted in the Last Supper. The disciples rely upon the hospitality of others as they teach and travel together, and the Lord’s Supper becomes the great equalizing act of hospitality for the early church. 1 Peter is written to a congregation and people in exile, and the writer of Hebrews implores all to show hospitality to strangers, for by doing so, some of shown “hospitality to angels unawares” (Hebrews 13:2).

The outsiders are the poor, the lame, the stranger, marginalized women and children, and even Samaritans and Gentiles. The story of the Good Samaritan\(^\text{158}\) redefines neighbor and challenges the understanding of eternal life, which begins now with how we love God and treat our neighbor. No one is “not-neighbor,” and Christ challenges all to \(^\text{157}\) John 4:1-42.

---

\(^\text{158}\) Luke 10:25-37
go and be neighbors to others. In so many passages in the gospels, the outsider is the one who understands what insiders cannot, reminding us that we have something to learn from the outsider. The Samaritan “got it,” blind Bartimaeus sees, children are brought close, and the poor and those who mourn are blessed.

Matthew 25:35-40 presents a story of judgment, “for I [the king] was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you welcomed me, I was naked and you gave me clothing, I was sick and you took care of me, I was in prison and you visited me.” Jesus once again identifies himself as the outsider, the least of these. To neglect the vulnerable is to turn away God. In the story of Jesus and the Samaritan woman in John 4, he goes out of his way to be with a foreigner and outsider, one looked down upon and despised. It was shocking that Christ conversed with the Samaritan woman, who seems to have been an outsider, getting water alone; yet, in this divine encounter, people are changed. She was so astonished by her encounter with Christ, that she left her water jar and ran back to the town. Many followed her back to the well and met the Lord and believed. For Christ offered a water of a different sort.

Christ’s meals in the gospels extend God’s hospitality as divine host and offer a foretaste of God’s kingdom where lives are transformed. The repeated recipients of God’s welcome are the poor, outcasts, the marginalized. In the Gospel of Luke, Christ’s ministry is the embodiment of God’s welcome and Isaiah’s exhortation to display

159 Mark 10:46-52
160 Matthew 19:14; Mark 10:14
161 Matthew 5
162 Luke 4:1-42
hospitality,\textsuperscript{163} sharing meals, and extending God’s saving presence that yields transformation. This also appears in Luke 5:29 at the feast hosted by the tax collector, in Luke 7:36-50 with the Pharisee and sinful woman, and in Luke 14 Christ invites the poor, the lame, the crippled to the great banquet.\textsuperscript{164} The parable of the great banquet reinforces God and Christ as the \textit{divine host}. In the divine hospitality of God, Jesus Christ opened his heart to the world, ready to receive all who might come. These texts challenge us to consider how we, the church, receive the hospitality of Christ and in turn give it. Joshua Jipp, in \textit{Saved by Faith and Hospitality}, writes such experiences with Jesus as divine host result in a response: “Divine hospitality elicits human hospitality.”\textsuperscript{165}

Romans 12:13 encourages Christians to “contribute to the needs of the saints, extend hospitality to the stranger” equating strangers with the saints of God. Christ himself was a stranger and an foreigner, moving from town to town, continuing the motif of God on the move from the Old Testament. One cannot consider the theme of hospitality without considering all the times in which Christ broke bread and changed lives in the feedings of the masses, the Last Supper, and the meal in Emmaus. Jesus Christ’s ultimate demonstration of hospitality are his outstretched arms on the cross, ready to receive all to himself. God as the divine migrant and the divine host are themes woven through Scripture.

The word “Christian” means Christ follower, one who follows in the path of Christ. The New Testament depicts Jesus as the divine sojourner and host; thus, we who follow Christ are to imitate these attributes. Philippians 3:20 reminds the church that our ultimate citizenship is in heaven and that we are strangers and foreigners in this world. Galatians 3:28 further breaks down any identity we otherwise might have, “there is neither Jew nor Gentile, slave nor free, male and female; for you all are one in Christ Jesus.” Our identity is to be that of Christ, the one who sojourned with us, sharing hospitality with the outsider.

\textsuperscript{163} Isaiah 58:6 share your bread with hungry
\textsuperscript{164} Luke 14:1-23
\textsuperscript{165} Jipp, \textit{Saved by Faith and Hospitality}, 177.

In Galatians, Paul reminds the Gentile Christians that circumcision is not necessary for being a Christ-follower, but remembering the poor is not optional. Last, this was a key part of the first church decisions in which the apostles decided what were the most important parts of the blossoming Christian movement.166 What unites all Christian groups is their faith in Christ and that they remember the poor.

The Early Church and Church History

Since the entire first section was devoted to how the church throughout time has engaged culture in ministry with those who suffer, I will not repeat the information again. For a comprehensive congregational study, it will be helpful to address the rich tradition handed to us the church today. It is important to teach laity that ministry with asylum seekers stands on a strong foundation of the long history of the church and the people of God. Sometimes evangelical leaning churches neglect to teach church history because it is not in the Bible, but it is important to show that serving and ministering to the suffering of the sojourner and the asylum seeker is something that Christians have done in the name of Christ throughout history. Chapter one offers a wealth of information to draw on for teaching the history of the church’s engagement with the poor.

---

166 Acts 6 seeks to address the daily distribution of food to the poor and widows by establishing deacons.
The Current Situation for Asylum Seekers

Because there is so much misinformation in the media, especially about asylum seekers, it is critical that preparatory training and teaching cover the truth and the complexities of this legal and political dilemma. If possible, have someone visit with you who works in a reputable ministry on the border. Most denominations have missionaries and aid agencies on the border, and they will be the best resources. I can recommend the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship Immigration and Advocacy Team and field personnel in the Rio Grande Valley of Texas, Fellowship Southwest, Lutheran Refugee Services, World Relief, and Sister Norma and her work in south Texas,167 just to name a few. Most of the big refugee resettlement organizations such as the World Council of Churches and International Rescue Committee also have helpful information and resources for churches. DASH (Dallas Fort Worth Asylum Seeker Housing) Network in Fort Worth Texas is a good resource for those in Texas, and Catholic Charities is doing a lot of good work for immigrants in the Rio Grande Valley and in the big cities of Texas. While it might be difficult to talk about the political and legal ramifications of immigration in church, it is very important to address misinformation which can easily prevent someone from fully engaging with the issue from a Christ-centered perspective. The National Immigration Forum advocates on Capitol Hill for immigration issues and has up-to-date information about bills under consideration. Each week, Adam Isacson with the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA) offers information on the southern border, and in my experience is a good source for reputable updates and information. He highlights the often difficult history between the U.S. military and Latin America.\textsuperscript{168} It is important to consider the U.S.’s responsibility and the role of U.S. policy in the Latin American diaspora and destabilization of the region.\textsuperscript{169}

Second, another crucial step is to learn from churches that are addressing the need and ministering with asylum seekers. Join weekly Zoom calls with organizations and churches working with asylum seekers across the country to learn what others are doing and how they are doing it. After hearing statistics and facts, seeing headlines and billboards, and reading the news, it is natural to feel helpless and hopeless. When this happens, a ministry or action never gets off the ground. Seeing firsthand what other congregations are doing is a crucial step in moving a congregation from contemplation into action. Once people see other normal, mid-size congregations doing amazing work in the name of Christ, the idea is de-mystified. It is strengthening to learn from others ministering in this way.

Mark 8: Following Christ

Finally, I conclude with a look at Mark 8:34 and Christ’s call to discipleship. In all three synoptic gospels, Christ reminds his disciples what it means to follow him: “If anyone would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me” (Mark 8:34; see also Luke 9:23, Matthew 16:24). For many in the North American church, our lives have become isolated from the “least of these” (Matthew 25:40), which includes the poor, the outsider or stranger, the hungry, and the sick. A major challenge and area of growth for my congregation has been to step out of our insulated lives and into the more intentional ministry with the “least of these.” When we are engaged with suffering persons in the world, we are living fully into whom God has called us to be, as followers of Jesus Christ.

\textsuperscript{169} For more information see https://www.wola.org/program/central-america/addressing-the-root-causes-of-migration/.

Anyone who seeks to follow Christ must deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow Christ. Who is this Christ we follow? As demonstrated throughout Scripture, he is a sojourner. He is always on the move, going to the suffering and those on the margins of society. Following Christ leads us into relationships with the same kind of people with whom Christ had relationships—the poor, the outcast, the sick and those who suffer. Christ exists in community as the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in a relationship of mutuality. What does it mean to follow Christ who lives and reigns in community? It means we, too, invest in community and give and receive in humility and mutuality. We walk with Christ as Christ companions and walks with us. When we look at the Christ of Scripture, we see that he walked, often out of his way, to be with the sick, the suffering, and the outcast. Fulfilling the prophecy as he read from the scroll of Isaiah,170 Christ inaugurated his ministry, proclaiming that his ministry would be for the prisoners, the oppressed, the brokenhearted, and the infirm. As the body of the Christ, the church should continue this ministry today as we follow Christ.

What does it mean in Mark 8 to take up our cross and deny self? Denying self does not mean self-flagellation or starving ourselves. It means we let go of our wants and compulsions and put them in right relationship to God—putting God’s purposes first. This does not mean that we are spiritually or emotionally unhealthy, or let other people

---

170 Luke 4:17-21 from Isaiah 61:1-2, “The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to proclaim good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners and recovery of sight for the blind, to set the oppressed free, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favor.”
abuse us, but it does mean that we yield our desires that are not in line with what and whom God has called us to be. Mary, the mother of Jesus, is the ultimate example of letting go of our desires and seeking God’s kingdom first, as demonstrated in her prayer, “Let it be unto me according to your word” (Luke 1:38). She demonstrated the epitome of hospitality by yielding her desires to that of God’s plan and by bearing in her body the Christ child. Her entire physicality was reoriented to God’s ways and to God’s calling upon her life, for the sake of the world. In much the same ways, God’s callings upon our lives will reorient us. It is consuming at times, and we bear the weight of it in our bodies and spirits. Mary’s hospitality to God exemplifies this idea in Mark 8:34-35, that we are to deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow Christ. As we open ourselves in hospitality to God, we follow Christ in ministry with the “least of these” (Matt. 25:42-45).

Throughout the New Testament, the motif of God’s care for the sojourner is embodied in the life of Christ who was a refugee. God chooses to identify Godself with those seeking refuge and asylum. Christ also embodies holy hospitality and divine welcome and Jesus acts as divine host instituting the Eucharist. Jesus redefines neighbor and Christ followers embrace their ultimate citizenship in heaven. These all make a compelling case for turning our gaze to the suffering and specifically to those seeking asylum. The call of God to care for the foreigner should ring louder than any negative press and misinformation. Politicians and lawmakers can debate the political and legal solutions, but Christians should never forget that God gives the church the responsibility to care, regardless of whether someone has the right papers, can speak English, or has come to the border the “right way.”
Chapter 3. Developing Blueprints and Setting Structure

After studying Scripture and church history, the hearts of the congregation and minister are more ready to discern a calling. Having a clear vision or understanding of a calling to this type of ministry is important in creating plans. Unfortunately, there are no blueprints for opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers as each context is different. Getting some clarity about God’s calling, however, will help shape the work of building this ministry. This chapter explores how to begin building a ministry of this sort, beginning first with addressing vocational calling.

Now that we have laid a strong foundation of biblical and ecclesial precedence for extending hospitality to asylum seekers, we can begin building a ministry. While some might suggest that their church has not engaged in hands-on ministry with those on the margins, like the asylum seeker, because they have not received a calling from God, I propose that it is quite difficult to receive a calling from God if the soil has not been tilled or fertilized or if the congregation or person is not primed or ready to hear. I never considered that I could be a senior pastor in a congregation until my previous church called a woman as the senior pastor. I knew that God had called me to ministry, but I had not seen a woman as a pastor and therefore my imagination could not envision being a pastor myself. Once I was on staff in a church that had a woman as a senior pastor, I could then begin to entertain the questions, “Could I be called this?” “Am I being called to this?”

In the same way, the theological and biblical preparation of Chapter 2 is essential in creating space for the Holy Spirit to be about the work of calling, molding, and shaping one’s vision and passion for ministry. Seeking to be who God has called them to be,
Christ followers must consider and ponder questions of calling and vocation. How do we create space for God to call us? How do we listen to God? What is our Christian vocation? What is the vocation of the church? What is your vocation and calling, as a child of God and as a local church, in particular? The study in the previous chapter is an essential part of the preparation for hearing and sensing God’s guidance and calling.

Vocation and Calling

Baptism is our basic ordination and a sign of God’s call in our life. Stanley Hauerwas and Will Willimon in Resident Aliens assert that each Christ-follower has a mission in the world: “All Christians, by their baptism are ‘ordained’ to share in Christ’s work in the world.” 171 Well-meaning Christians can get sidetracked from this vocation by any number of enticing avenues. Often, “good” things distract us from the best that God has for us, which can be participating in God’s work and ministry in and around us. Work, family and recreation, all good gifts in and of themselves, can become the very things with prevent Christians from engaging in ministries like a hospitality house. To be honest, a ministry of sharing life does take emotional investment and some time. These are rare commodities in our day and age. It may require rearranging our schedules and lives. Few Christians seem to take seriously that we are to share in Christ’s work in the world: we are called to be co-laborers with Christ.

In the previous chapters, we have seen how the early church interpreted this in ministry with the suffering and overlooked. We also looked at the biblical witness of caring for the sojourner and outsider and specifically at Christ’s own ministry of healing.

---

and restoration with those who were hungry, sick, and outcast. In this chapter, we will address how our understanding of vocation impacts how we approach life and ministry. For our congregation, the calling was to accompany asylum seekers in ways that lead to life and Christian community. This calling guided how we structured our ministry, and this chapter is about that structure.

In Resident Aliens, Hauerwas and Willimon write of a pastor who stood up in a meeting of concerned citizens arguing against the desegregation of schools in the south. He was a pastor and an ordinary person who had labored long and hard, earning respect in the community and faithfully showing up in people’s lives, all of which prepared him for that night at the community meeting. Living out our Christian vocation, which is necessarily ethical, simply boils down to “an ordinary person living out the Christian life before other ordinary people.”\(^{172}\) We have a Christian vocation to be God’s people in our respective places, and sometimes we have specific callings to certain places or people. This is the intersection at which our congregation found ourselves—trying to discern God’s particular calling and wondering if stepping out into the great unknown of opening a hospitality house was God’s guidance and our work to do.

This journal entry describes my own personal calling as it unfolded, and that of our congregation, for this ministry of hospitality with asylum seekers:

\(\text{Vocation and calling are complex. We have a Christian vocation as a Christ-follower and congregations have a vocation to be the people of God in their respective locations. As Christians, our Christian vocation should overlap and inform our professional vocations. For example, in our work (as an educator or a farmer), we live out our Christian vocation to be a Christ-follower. As a minister my professional vocation is a part of a specific calling from God to be a minister. I count this as gift and blessing to have this call and intersection that many do not have. It is a privilege to have my work, my Christian vocation, and my calling all overlap completely. Many Christians sense a specific calling to a specific job or}\) community as a part of their Christian vocation. At times, we can sense a particular call to a particular type of ministry and this is what happened with the calling to start a hospitality house. It started so small because of little exposures to the needs of others. I believe it also grew because of our congregation’s contemplative spiritual practices. In that deep listening and looking, God moved in multiple hearts at the same time. In so many ways, it has been a journey of transformation.

\(^{172}\) Hauerwas and Willimon, Resident Aliens, 111.

Transformation

Stepping into the unknown of starting a hospitality house is an act of trust and hope that God still calls and moves in and among the people of God on behalf of the world. It is an act of faith, and it can be exciting as well as unnerving. There are unknowns and a lot of questions, and just as many who have gone before us were transformed when they said “yes” to the Holy Spirit’s vocational calling, we can trust that we will be transformed along the way, too.

Two weeks before he was murdered while offering the bread and cup of the Eucharist, Archbishop Oscar Romero entered the cathedral in San Salvador to celebrate mass. He wrote about it in his diary saying:

I went to celebrate Mass in the presence of the bodies of nine people killed by the military repression, which have been in the cathedral since yesterday. I used the message of the homily to say that those bodies are a lesson about the elevated destiny that human beings have—eternity. They are an indictment of the sin that rules on earth to such an extent that it can kill in this way. 173

He presided as archbishop for a short period in the time of a reign of violence, during which his impact was amplified and far-reaching. His preaching centered around God’s love for the poor and the Christian vocation of “conversion” as he put it—allowing God to transform us from the inside out so that we may in turn extend the hospitality of Christ. This image of him preaching in the presence of martyred bodies exemplified his life, and he was canonized a saint in the Catholic Church in 2015.

---

When Romero received the position of archbishop three years earlier, no one foresaw that he would become the bold leader who stood with the poor, who spoke truth to power, who walked the streets and countryside of El Salvador listening to the cries of the brokenhearted and oppressed, and who stood among the dead offering the Eucharist. The story of Oscar Romero is one of transformation. Not the radical choice, he was chosen to lead because he seemed to be one who might not rock the boat. He was the “safe” choice. As Romero submitted to the work that God called him to do, shepherding a people who were oppressed and terrorized, the seeds of internal transformation began to sprout in him. By opening his heart in hospitality to the sufferings of God’s people, his heart also was changed. Walking, praying, listening, and preaching, he became the voice for the poor and oppressed of El Salvador. His death was one of the hundreds who lost their lives in ministry and service to God in El Salvador, including four women missionaries from the U.S. murdered later that year.

Romero preached on the power of love and forgiveness while also calling for reform and justice for the poor. He encouraged those who had been wronged to take on the love of Christ and to extend forgiveness. Even if it meant disobeying orders, he called on perpetrators of violence to lay down their arms and follow the way of Christ. Romero showed us what the gospel looks like when lived out in love in the face of sin. Known for

---

174 Ibid., 57.
176 To put his impact in perspective for North Americans, Oscar Romero is to El Salvador what Martin Luther King, Jr. is to the U.S.
walking through the streets visiting with people and listening to their stories, he saw in each person the image of Christ. Just before his murder at the chapel altar, he preached: “Nothing is so important to the Church as the human person, above all, the person of the poor and the oppressed, who besides being human beings, are also divine beings, since Jesus said that whatever is done to them, he takes as done to him.”177 Any violence against another goes directly to the heart of God is an echo of what Jesus said in Matthew 25, “whatever you have done to the least of these you have done to me.”

The gift of Oscar Romero to us today, to the church squarely situated in North American privilege, may just be the courage to step forth into the vocational calling that Christ has for us and to allow that calling to transform us. Guided by his understanding of seeing the image of Christ in the other, he learned as he listened to the poor, and his heart was emboldened for justice. When we step out in faith in the direction of the Holy Spirit, we will be changed, and along the way so will others as well.

Christian practices often give rise to new knowledge—a new way of knowing God. In the early church, Gregory of Nyssa criticized others for only relying on theological ideas and ignoring Christian practices.178 We come to know God better through the practices of the faith. In praying regularly, in submitting to and listening to God through Scripture and prayer, we grow and are changed. Elizabeth Newman describes hospitality as a Christian practice in which we also meet God. This is not sappy, sentimental hospitality but hospitality and worship that are inexorably linked as participation in God’s own communion: “hospitality is our participation in what God is doing.”

Through this lens of Christian hospitality, we can better understand the encounter between Christ and two disciples on the road to Emmaus in Luke 24. They were confused and concerned as they processed their disappointment with the stranger walking with them. They had been seeing it all wrong and could not recognize Christ. It was not until the risen Christ took, blessed, broke, and gave the bread that their eyes were opened. The one they thought was a stranger was the Christ—the one who came bringing new life. In walking on the road with a stranger, listening and learning, their transformation began. In the very simple act of sharing a meal together, the ordinary became sacred, and they recognized God among them.

Similarly, in the one who is different from and unknown to us, we have opportunities to meet Christ in the “other.” This is where and how a transformation of the heart takes place. We need this conversion, as our mentor Oscar Romero puts it. It will pull us out of our siloed worldview and into the presence of Christ the stranger. The vocational call to share and receive the hospitality of Christ includes our sisters and brothers who have been calling out to the North American church seeking reprieve from systems of racism in our country. And it extends to the pilgrim church coming from Latin America to our border and to our state. Our churches are positioned at the crossroads of these needs and voices, and now we can walk on the road with them and join them on the journey. When we open our hearts in hospitality and worship with those who are

---

179 Ibid., 60.
“strangers”—those we may not recognize, trusting that in doing so we will meet Christ the stranger—our eyes will be opened.

Envisioning a Ministry

Beginning a ministry of opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers is a daunting endeavor, which underscores the importance of having a clear sense of God’s guidance. At DaySpring, we kept moving forward, seeking clarity and confirmation about what we thought we might be called to. Even as we moved forward, we wondered if we were sensing God’s calling correctly. As we walked, trusted, and opened ourselves to God, we became increasingly more convinced that God was meeting us in it. The more we heard concerns and hit road bumps, the clearer our calling became. Each challenge we faced caused us to think and evaluate what we were hoping for and how we were discerning the Holy Spirit’s direction. Instead of being discouraged with these unexpected road bumps, it was as if the Holy Spirit gave us a determination and energy for the challenges ahead.

To begin a ministry of a hospitality house for asylum seekers, one of the first tasks is to be able to envision what it might look like and how a congregation might extend itself in this way. It is helpful to visit others who are doing similar work. Seek and study multiple models of ministry and identify a model that aligns best with your congregation’s strengths, knowing that you will have to adjust to make it your own. Some churches have short-term shelters, others have a church member who opens their home, and other congregations offer a room in their church to an asylum-seeking family. There are many models, and it is important to find some examples of this kind of ministry in action and study them. Consider your strengths and weaknesses as you look for models.
This same strengths-based approach is useful for so many aspects of developing and maintaining a hospitality ministry. You may not find a model that exactly fits what you can do and that is okay. No two ministries or congregations are exactly alike. Seek collaboration with others doing similar work in congregations and visit them. Talking with real people, with real jobs and families, in congregations with limited resources who are doing the work, demystifies the project. When you can see that you do not have to be a social worker or a mental health professional, or a congregation with a lot of money to embark on the journey of sharing hospitality in this way, the task becomes doable. As mentioned in the previous chapter, learning and educating are crucial steps in preparing a congregation to develop a vision for this kind of ministry.

Also mentioned earlier, church history has laid a foundation for the church to see in the “other,” the stranger or the outsider, the image of Christ. Seeing Christ in the stranger is a crucial part of developing a vision for ministry with asylum seekers. The journal entry below ironically captures the idea of seeing Christ in the stranger and how an “outsider” understood the imago Dei. As this story demonstrates, it is often complicated to live this out in practical ways.

Winnie is a regular. She has come for years to the church seeking assistance, sometimes for rent, sometimes for laundry or a car payment or for electricity. We have taken her places and then felt like we were “used” and bamboozled. She came for months, claiming that she was pregnant with twins. She was pregnant with twins for about two years, and she always looked the same. If we have used up our benevolence budget for the month and we have nothing to give her she can become very hostile. We have tried connecting her with resources and agencies in town and she doesn’t seem mentally healthy enough to understand that they want to help her. Living lies is how she has made it in the world so far, hustling churches for money $20 here and $50 there. It must be a full-time job. She knows the kind of benevolence each church gives and when they give it. She comes and then will not leave until we give her a ride somewhere. Our hearts are compassionate and want desperately for Winnie to have a better life. She seems to want that too. But it is more of the same with Minnie.

Finally, our pastor had had enough of the stories (the list was long and colorful) and swindling and the threats:

“You should really lock that door, ma’am, I could walk in and shoot ya”, “Pastor you betta watch out.” “Don’t eva unlock that door an’ answer it.”

Part warning, part protection? We were never quite sure. We were out of benevolence money for the month, and we told her we had helped her 6 months in a row, and we needed to save next month’s money for another who needed it. She was angry. She came back two days later, on a Sunday morning, and began asking church members for money as they walked into worship. She cornered the pastor and me right before worship. I told the pastor to go on and I would handle it as he had to preach. I talked with Winnie and reminded her of our position that we had discussed on Friday. She was upset and yelling at me in front of the church building as parishioners walked in. I felt for Minnie and the desperation of her situation. We had had a long road with her and could not seem to move the needle in any helpful direction.

“How can you turn away someone who needs help?” “How in Jesus’ name can you do that?”

“Winnie, we are out of money from this fund this month and like we said on Friday, we need to save this for another family next month. You can check with Mission Waco this month for help”

“They won’t help me no more! Them turned their backs on me. I’m gonna have these babies any day now and you won’t help me.”

“I’m sorry Winnie. I can imagine this is so hard.” I question this decision and feel caught and am asking myself – Jesus will you just come and redeem us all? How would you have me respond?

Walking away yelling at me and to anyone who might hear:

“You just don’t get it do ya? Jesus gonna come back as a black woman! I could be Jesus right now and you are turning me away! Turning me away! I could be Jesus! You just don’t get it.”

My heart broke. You are so right Winnie. So right.

Ministry with people can be messy, even when we have the best of intentions as this story with Winnie demonstrates. Winnie understood that Christ is often met in the stranger. Knowing this makes it doubly difficult to say no as ones giving and extending hospitality. Having clear boundaries and a clear purpose of what a ministry can and cannot do is however essential in staying healthy for the long-haul. Knowing strengths and limitations helps with establishing boundaries.
Employing a strengths-based approach, evaluate the strengths and limitations of the congregation and the community. What are the resources and talent base within the congregation? Are there teachers and healthcare workers in the congregation who might be able to help navigate the school and medical systems? Are there small business owners who can lend support to immigrants needing to find creative ways to make money?

So, how did we begin? We started out small with one small family, spending several years learning, listening, and praying. We built relationships and trust. We built trust with each other that we would be committed to this ministry and work, and we built trust with our new asylee family. We also began to build trust in the community with our partners. As we began, we had to take stock of our strengths and our weaknesses and assess what we could do well and where we knew we would need help. Starting out small allowed us to do this in real-time.

It is important to enter this type of work with a realistic view of what you can and cannot do. It is impossible to meet every need, and it is easy to become overwhelmed and to try to be all things to everyone. Trying to address every need and inequality can lead to a serious risk of burnout. Ministries that do not have boundaries often seem on the verge of collapse. Burnout can easily creep in if you are not clear about what you can say yes to and what you need to say no to. Churches and ministries with immigrants must be able today say no, which is a hard boundary to set with well-meaning ministers and lay persons.

The second step in getting started is to start out small, which is one of the best ways to maintain boundaries and get a good feel for the strengths and weaknesses of the congregation and community. Begin looking for the immigrant community in your own town by helping teach an English as a second language class at a local church or some other organization. Connect, volunteer, and partner with organizations such as Christian Women’s Job Corp, Church World Services, World Relief and Lutheran Immigration Services, or other non-profits in your town that service women and families who are struggling. Learn about and volunteer with the Headstart programs in your area and the local food pantries. Start small by developing relationships with those seeking asylum and learn from them about their needs and challenges. Build partnerships with others in the community doing similar work. Note the gaps in care and areas that the church might be able to address. What unique services and supports does the community have? Is there a bus system or a community college? Research and connect with the community. Many start nonprofits in our community only to find out later that other organizations are doing the same work. Duplication of services is not a helpful way to begin and not helpful for long-term sustainability. Develop relationships with partner organizations and begin building coalitions. Who in the community helps with housing and grassroots community development? Habitat for Humanity can be a good partner, along with immigration advocacy groups, the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, and immigration lawyers and legal clinics.

Developing a vision, starting small, and building coalitions are necessary steps in developing a hospitality ministry with asylum seekers. Dream together as a team of church members, praying that God will guide you in accompanying the asylee. It is a process of discernment and development, of defining visions and refining dreams. Flexibility and persistence are signposts on this journey; they will be best friends that leaders must lean on over and over. Embarking on the process of envisioning and discerning can be complicated and feel like a roller coaster. As challenges arise, make space to creatively look at problems and seek new resolutions. There are good resources centered around discernment on a group and congregational level.\textsuperscript{181} Avail yourself of these formational tools and stick close to spiritual formation practices as you go through the process.\textsuperscript{182}

Denominational entities and sister churches can become significant partners with endeavors such as this. Do not be dismayed, however, if no other church commits to being a full partner. Remember, people often need to see it first before they can envision it and commit to it. As the Holy Spirit births a vision and passion in the congregation, the church or ministry team may have to lead out in it first, and trust that God will provide resources, people, and support along the way. Building strong community relationships and coalitions will bear fruit long after the ministry has begun and may very well yield future ministry partners. We were challenged early on to make all that we do replicable and to invite others to join us in the work at every step of the way. This is hard but rewarding ministerial work, and having partners is crucial. It takes forethought to be invitational and collaborative throughout the process, but it is worth it. In summary, to begin, it is important to develop a vision, to start out small, and build coalitions and partnerships.

\textsuperscript{181} See \textit{Discerning God’s Will Together} by Ruth Haley Barton and \textit{Opening to God} by David Benner.
Framing and Setting the Structure

This section speaks to “how we did it”—how we went about “building” the Naomi House as a hospitality ministry of our church. The following journal entry is from the early days of the process:

On the first night that our larger team of church members met, the 25 gathered and spent time in prayer, listening as Ruth 1:16-18 was read aloud, as lectio divina. We reflected together on Ruth and on Naomi, and on the relationship that had been forged between them on that journey. More importantly, we considered its implications for our identity and our mission as DaySpring Baptist Church. Those verses shaped our thoughts and our vision of ministry.

People often speak of Ruth as a “sojourner” or an “alien,” but technically that is incorrect. In all ancient Semitic languages, “sojourner” is only gendered as male.183 Males can be a sojourner and have certain rights, but because Ruth and Naomi were women, they had little status and few rights. They were barely considered people and yet there was provision. The Bible has over 100 verses on caring for widows, orphans, and sojourners or strangers in a land.

The contemporary connection is apparent. So many of those who come to the border are not considered sojourners in the most generous sense; they are barely considered people. Listen to the rhetoric surrounding immigrants at the border, especially those from Latin America.184 Read the accounts of children ripped from their parents’ arms and put in cages. Those who seek asylum have few rights and status and are without home, place, and position. Our congregation sought to provide a place that offers a different narrative, one that is rooted in and guided by the gospel. Here is an excerpt from another of our first communications to the congregation:

---

In the text from Ruth 1, people tend to focus on Ruth’s pledge to Naomi, but they often fail to give attention to Naomi’s response: “When Naomi saw that she was determined to go with her, she said no more to her.” Knowing full well that it might cost her something, both socially and financially, when it made no sense to take someone else in to feed or clothe, “Naomi saw that [Ruth] was determined,” and she could say no more except to walk alongside her in the journey.

With God’s help, we believe that the Naomi House could become a place where people who have no status, who are barely seen as people, could find a home and community, and we believe that it could be the place where we as a church see that they are determined, and we choose to walk alongside them in the journey.

Living out the gospel call to walk where and how Christ walked often leads in a different direction than that of the surrounding culture. It is nevertheless the way of life.

The Process

Many have asked what led up to our congregation having this first night of dreaming together, and my answer is always that many factors, situations, and prayers brought us to the point of beginning to dream together how the church might extend itself in ministry with immigrants. Several instigating situations brought the issue front and center. Our friend, fellow pastor, and colleague, John Garland, wrote an article for Christianity Today describing his church’s (San Antonio Mennonite Church) work with asylum seekers. Just two and a half hours south of Waco, San Antonio Mennonite Church was amidst an overwhelming immigrant situation, especially during the height of 185 Dennis Tucker, letter to the DaySpring congregation.

---

the influx to the border during the Trump administration.\textsuperscript{187} They were extending themselves in significant ways with an overwhelming need, and our congregants wanted to help. I arranged a trip for twenty members of the congregation to visit and help in any way we could. We realized how small this church was and how few resources they had, yet they were making a huge difference with their Mary and Martha House, a short-term shelter for women and children searching for safety and seeking asylum. While there, we cooked with the women in the home, heard their stories of fleeing violence, and heard of their amazing faith in God. We visited the shelter set up by the city and spent time in prayer. While we were there, someone from our team asked Pastor Garland, “Should we open a hospitality house?” His immediate response was, “Yes!” Then he backed it back a bit and followed up with a “No. You shouldn’t open a hospitality house. It is just too hard and difficult. We do need a social worker though. Maybe you can help us make connections and raise some money for one.” We dreamt and prayed about this, went home, and raised $25,000 for the church to hire a social worker. At a debriefing time back in Waco, we filled our pastor in on what we had experienced, and Pastor Garland’s word, “No, you shouldn’t” echoed in our minds. It was as if those words became a challenge.

\textbf{Vision and Values}

Shortly thereafter, Pastor Garland called and let us know that one of the young women in the home, whom we had met, needed a place to live. She was eighteen years old, had a newborn baby, and she did not know anyone in the U.S. Our hearts had been heavy with concern about the situation on the southern border, and we had already met this young lady in the home. Now the immigration crisis had a face and a familiar name. Seeing a church ministering in this way opened our imagination, and our interest piqued. We were beginning to see ourselves in ministry like this, whereas before the trip to San Antonio, it felt like a huge overwhelming challenge in which we did not know where to begin or how to engage.

\textsuperscript{187} TRAC Immigration, “Record Number of Asylum Cases in FY 2019” (Jan. 8, 2020), (December 22, 2022), https://trac.syr.edu/immigration/reports/588/.

I emailed the group of church members who had gone to San Antonio and those who were also interested, told them of this young woman’s need for housing, and a family from the church stepped up and opened their home. The church committed to walk alongside them in this ministry, supporting them in whatever way they needed, from helping with transportation, to English tutors, babysitters, prayer partners, friendship, and many other ways. This family’s courage to step out, with the church behind them, allowed the church to also step out in a small way with a new kind of relational ministry. This young woman and her child became a part of the congregation, her child was dedicated in worship, everyone bought her tamales, and four years later, she was living in the Naomi House helping to provide transportation to the guests and helping establish a weekly meal in the home.

Initially, a small team formed around this family and the young mother when she first came, supporting, encouraging, and learning how to help connect the mother and child with resources in the Waco community. After several years of encouraging this family, another team began to form that wanted to engage more fully in ministry with those seeking asylum. We determined that women seeking asylum are really at the bottom of the list of those who are the “least of these” as Christ describes in Matthew 25.
They are at risk for violence, exploitation, and trafficking, there is no help from the government or aid agencies, and they cannot work or support their families for months until their work permit is approved. We also continually experience in our Texas culture the antipathy and disdain toward them, and our hearts were drawn to extending the love and peace of Christ amidst this hardship. This small group began meeting for prayer and dreaming, and eventually became a steering committee, exploring the idea of how the congregation might further engage in ministry with the asylum seeker.

In addition to the trip to San Antonio where a church family had taken in a young woman and her child, the next precipitating factor that helped instigate this ministry was encouragement from a local church. Hope Fellowship, a local Mennonite house church, contacted DaySpring and asked if we might be interested in purchasing a church member’s house to use as a hospitality house for immigrants. They had heard of our growing interest in ministry of this sort, and they committed to pray for and with us about this opportunity.

In meeting and consulting with other faith leaders, I was challenged to find a way to make this burgeoning ministry replicable, to create a model that other churches might imitate. Additionally, I wanted to keep this ministry directly tied to the DNA of the congregation. DaySpring Baptist Church was founded in 1993 by a core group who were burned out from church work. They intentionally set the tag line of the church as “sacred and simple” and named the road to the church Renewal Way. They affectionately called DaySpring “Last Stop Baptist Church” as it was the 79th Baptist church in Waco in 1993, and because it already was the last stop for people considering leaving Baptist life, or even the Christian faith altogether. Because it was founded by people exhausted from church work, it has maintained a low footprint and little structure and overhead. DaySpring began embracing the contemplative life early on, and the congregation became a place of renewal and healing for so many who found their way there. After twenty years, however, the congregation still had not found its footing in ministry in the community. One of my tasks as Minister for Community Life was to explore what that might look like. The church was ready for a ministry it could wrap its arms around, and my challenge was to help it reflect the personality and passion of the congregation. With encouragement from a partner church and a ready and primed congregation, the seeds of years of ministry were now germinating.

Discernment

In the formation of this ministry of hospitality, the church and I worked hard to keep all this history of the church in mind. It has been essential that we find a way to craft a ministry that reflects the values of the church: DaySpring is a place of renewal and healing; we keep things simple so that we can focus on the sacred. When the Mennonite Church offered their community house for DaySpring to purchase, we had to take a long look at how it fit in with our values of simplicity. The house was big, and a loan was going to be an even bigger stretch. We then leaned more and more into the idea of starting small, seeking replication. Eventually, we made the hard decision not to pursue purchasing this house, which seemed perfect and in the exact neighborhood that we had chosen as the best place for this ministry. It was discouraging at first, because we realized that the financial investment would be too high, and the house might be too big for what we were beginning to think we wanted to do.
As indicated, many factors contributed to the process of opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers, and we discovered five more factors on our journey of discernment toward action. First, the church had a strong foundation of missional engagement in Latin America. Over the years, there had been a couple of Latin Americans in the congregation who planted seeds of care and concern for Latin America. Second, many were ready for “something,” but there was a lack of a cohesive missional engagement in the congregation. Third, two presenting experiences pushed the issue forward: the crisis on the border and our proximity to it, as we heard of it through friends in San Antonio, and a church family opening their home to the young asylum-seeking woman and her baby. The fourth factor that continued to help our discernment was the relationship we built with this young woman and her baby and her assimilation into the life of the church. Every Sunday, her presence reminded us of what the body of Christ is called to be. Fifth, the church had a high sense of vocational calling to be the hands and feet of Christ. This was due to the church’s overall theological and educational teaching. Specifically, we held a series on immigration and had done a lot of teaching on race and the church’s role in race relations in America.

The congregation was primed and ready to hear a calling from God. As a contemplative Baptist church, some have thought that the church was insular; “navel gazing” is a word that I have heard. And while to some it might appear that way, true Christian contemplation must always have an outward expression. Church members had many ways in which they were living out their Christian vocation in the world. Many had a high sense of vocational call, meaning the work that they were doing each week in education or health care was something they felt called to because of their faith. The church, however, had not embraced a call collectively. This high sense of vocational call among church members could have been a constraint on those who were busy and exhausted. At the same time, it was an opportunity because they were in touch with their desires to live out their faith in ways that impacted the world. As a leader, I wondered for many years when the church would find its missional call. I even questioned if it would happen, but we kept on teaching and leading towards that end, waiting for the intersection of receptivity and opportunity.

Seed Money: Seeing the Possibility

After the leadership team declined to pursue purchasing the Mennonite house, they went back to the drawing board, all the while communicating with the congregation the vision and the adjustments that were being made. The steering team continued creating a vision for this ministry, researching other ministries and models, and considering the steps necessary to lead the congregation in this way. Late in 2021, a church member donated $15,000 to the congregation to be used in some way for ministry with immigrants. Until this point, so much of the planning and discussing was without any money in the church budget for this ministry. The steering committee challenged the congregation to match this and quickly the church had $44,000 as seed money for the new ministry. During this time, a church member began conversations with the staff about offering a home he owned for the church to rent for the hospitality house. He had done a significant amount of work on the house and the steering team began to seriously consider this possibility. We were all drawn to the idea that a church member wanted to partner with the church in this way to help start this ministry.
By March 2022, the steering team began preparing to present a vision for the ministry so that the church could vote on allocating funds raised and create a financial plan to launch the ministry. The purpose and vision for the ministry, and the financial plan were approved by the congregation.

Ministry Purpose Statement and Covenant

We began with a vision or purpose statement and tried not to get too specific about the details as we started off:

> DaySpring’s Naomi House will center around a common life and faith, sharing hospitality with the immigrant through mutual support and empowerment in ways that catalyze the congregation in ministry and invigorate our faith.

Community Covenant
- To receive one another as Christ in our midst;
- To treat one another with dignity and respect;
- To participate in and share together a common meal;
- To address conflict in a way that honors one another;
- To respect the privacy and private space of individuals within the home;
- To participate in the stewardship of the house;
- To pray for one another.

After much debate about what and how we wanted to minister, we settled on the hospitality house being an extension of the ministry and witness of the DaySpring congregation. For a congregation whose motto is “sacred and simple,” starting a hospitality house for asylum seekers did not seem simple, and we were aware of the cost and burden we were undertaking. Some wondered if we should start a non-profit instead and let that entity bear the burden of directing and organizing a ministry of hospitality. There were merits to that approach, but in the end, we let two things guide us in our decision about how to go about this endeavor.

First, we relied upon our church’s theme of simplicity and decided to start out small and let something grow and develop over time. It could turn into a non-profit someday; however, we hoped it would not. We wanted to guard against “farming out” the ministry of the church. We opted to see some of the challenges we had at the beginning, such as finding a house, to motivate us to keep our scope narrow, start small, and invite other churches along the way to join us in this work. We also reflected upon how extending hospitality in this way is the sum of the gospel: to share God’s hospitable love in a way that leads to renewal and Christian transformation. Understanding “simple” to mean distilling faith to that which is essential, the hospitality house made this faith expression more congruent with the church’s ethos.

Second, we leaned into our church’s emphasis on community and being a place of rest. We sought to create space for relationships to develop and for healing to happen. We guarded against relegating the ministry to a nonprofit. We were clear that we wanted this ministry of hospitality to be an outpouring of the church’s mission and ministry, and as stated, we sought to make this ministry a reflection of the DNA of the congregation.

Who and Why? Latina Asylum Seekers

In listening to other ministries and congregations involved in caring for the immigrant, one thing became clear: the need was overwhelming, and many people were burned out. Our hearts were initially drawn to the Latina asylum seeker due to our proximity to the border (seven hours). We heard their stories of fleeing violence and came to see that, in many ways, it is the pilgrim church coming to our border for refuge and safety. In addition to our compassion and desire for justice for so many of those at our border, we also had much to learn from them about their faith in God through adversity and trials. We recognized that the church, and our little congregation, needed a fresh expression of the Christian faith that the pilgrim church had to offer. We believed that we would encounter Christ in the sojourner, and we have. We have kept our scope narrow: women and children who speak Spanish and who come seeking asylum.

Our town had some resources in Spanish but little for other languages, so we kept our focus narrowly on Latinas. Women with children are vulnerable to exploitation and have a huge challenge with finding work and caring for their children. Someday, we may decide to open our doors to families with men, but for the time being, we started small and focused. We have had to say no many times to people who did not fit our scope and that is always hard to do. We want to be in this type of ministry for the long haul, so we keep the goals of being manageable and replicable in mind as we plan.

Hosts and Guests: Roles and Responsibilities

Dietrich Bonhoeffer’s work, Life Together, had long been a guiding framework in our congregation. During his time of study, he made his way to America, but God placed such a burden on his heart for his home country, that he returned to Germany despite the dangers. It ultimately cost him his life. He is known for his phrase “cheap grace” that comes from salvation without discipline. Bonhoeffer writes about the role of prayer in the Christian life, that it extends beyond words into the whole day so that “every word, every work, every labor of the Christian becomes a prayer.”\(^{188}\) For many in our church, his legacy has influenced our understanding of community and prayer.

We have often studied and tried to apply what it means to live life together as the body of Christ in this place, leaning upon Bonhoeffer’s ideas of Christian community. We created this hospitality house with the idea that there would be hosts who lived in the home and who were the face of the church for the women and children in the home. Their role has been to set the tone for the home with rhythms of prayer and a community meal. They help create a home environment where the love of Christ is reflected in the home.

---

The House: Structuring the Ministry

As we connected with others in the community who were ministering with immigrants, we developed relationships and word began to spread that our church was seeking to minister in this way. When the option to purchase a house arose, none of the other entities seemed to have the bandwidth to consider how they might use a house for immigrants. They gave our congregation time to pray about and consider if we might want to purchase this house for use with immigrants. It was a big house with many bedrooms, and we became excited and energized by the idea of it full of women and children seeking asylum. We also could have several church members living in it, in hopes of creating a space of community and life together.

We sought financial partners and had some lined up. Eventually, however, we realized that the loan was going to be too costly and difficult to manage. We were tempted to be discouraged, but we knew that God was leading us. It was a lesson in trust and turning obstacles into opportunities. This situation allowed us the chance to clarify our vision and remember our guiding principle of seeking simplicity amid this new endeavor. We began to look for a much smaller house that we could rent. We doubled down on our vision to start out small and seek a replicable model. Eventually, a church member revealed that they had a house in the neighborhood we were interested in (due to its proximity to resources and church members), and he offered it as a place for the church to rent. We were drawn to the idea of a church member partnering with the church in this way and wanted to honor his desire of partnership. It has been the perfect home for the hospitality house.

During our year of exploration of this ministry, we formed a steering team to explore options, learn, pray, and engage the congregation in preparation for a hospitality house. This steering team held church-wide conversations, prayer meetings, Bible studies, and many meetings thinking through each aspect of the project. An important book to read as a team during this time of preparation was When Helping Hurts: How to Alleviate Poverty Without Hurting the Poor and Yourself by Steve Corbett and Brian Fikkert.189 This book empowers Christians to care and serve in culturally appropriate and dignifying ways and challenges North Americans to not impose our views of what is good and worthy onto those we serve.

In our next phase, we moved into several layers of support with a small leadership team, a finance team, and a hospitality and support team. The leadership team of four set the direction for the ministry, working with the chaplain volunteers for the house (mainly seminary students), and the interns and hosts, providing direction and conflict management. The finance team worked on the budget, addressing financial needs as they arise, and looking for funding streams outside of the congregation. The hospitality and support team sought to meet the tangible needs of the home such as groceries, transportation, mowing, clothing, English conversation partners, and more.

Dividing tasks among different teams allowed teams to take a deep dive into a certain area to develop a knowledge base of that area. Our goal, for example, was to have a couple of people who really knew the educational options in town and how to navigate them, and another team who understood the food pantry options, and so on—this versus having the entire team well-versed in all the details.

---

Trauma-Healing Congregation

One of the resources of our community and our congregation has been the influence of a university with a school of social work and a seminary. Through these resources, we have been able to arrange for training of our laity in areas of trauma-informed care and ministry. Any woman who would flee her country and embark on a two-thousand-mile journey by foot, through dangerous territory, must be fleeing some type of trauma or extreme hardship. The arduous journey is also one of violence and trauma; immigrants are often retraumatized. We spent a lot of time educating ourselves on trauma and cultural humility so that we could create a ministry that would be a space for health and healing for all involved.

Trauma-informed care understands and considers the pervasive nature of trauma and promotes environments of healing and recovery, guarding against practices and services that might inadvertently re-traumatize. Persons seeking to employ trauma-informed care in their interactions with asylum seekers are curious about what experiences or beliefs might lay behind actions or interactions that they experience. What is going on inside someone who might lead them to act in this manner? Those seeking to support asylum seekers need to hold confidences when appropriate and seek to build trusting relationships. Their story is just that, their story; it is theirs to tell and not anyone else’s to tell. This can be a challenge when trying to share the plight of immigrants coming to America and we recognized that we needed to navigate it gingerly. We learned that typical interactions must be viewed through the lens of trauma, such as how we share a hug or even the way we speak and converse. There are aggressive ways to speak and interact, which in our society might be seen more as direct but to those who have experienced trauma, it can be received as aggressive. Our body language and our verbal communication must express listening, receptivity, and non-judgment. Because so much of the violence in Latin America comes from the hands of men, we learned how important it is for male volunteers to be mindful of their posture, body language, and interactions, always seeking to show deference and humility.

---

We knew trauma-informed care would be a part of our ministry. Here are some reflections on what that looked like.

Journal: Trauma and trauma healing

One of the women in our home particularly exemplifies post-trauma responses. We knew that the women and children who might stay in our home would have experienced trauma. I am grateful we had these conversations and training in the beginning. Not all of our volunteers were at all the trainings, and additionally, even if they were their ability to apply the information learned is not equal. Some volunteers are seeing through the lens of trauma-care better than others. Several of the women are experiencing nightmares and depression. One can be triggered when a balloon pops or when she experiences a stressful situation. Sometimes she has panic attacks, or vomits, or blanks out for a while. We are working to educate them (with the help of our social worker who has connected them with counseling) on trauma and stress responses and post-traumatic stress disorder. Not to generalize, however, it does seem that mental health knowledge is not as common for some of the immigrants that we have experienced. Often, they will complain of a stomachache which may be associated with stress and trauma responses. One of the children is acting out in school by getting into fights with other boys. Granted, he has been out of school for two years. He is also in school in his second and third languages. His primary language is an indigenous language from Central America. Upon arriving here in Texas, he hardly spoke Spanish. He cannot read nor write in Spanish or his indigenous language, the result of having lived in hiding for over a year and then making the journey to America for safety. Now here, he is learning a new language and learning to read and write in both languages which are not his primary language. That is a lot for a young child to deal with on top of the trauma of watching his family members’ murders. Trauma often begets trauma. Meaning, those who have been traumatized have a higher propensity to inflict trauma onto others or to be vulnerable to being victims of trauma again. For example, abused women who leave an abusive spouse, are vulnerable and often need help finding safe housing. They can drift from one home to another, sometimes not always in the safest of circumstances. So, we have concerns about one of our teen girls who is connecting with unknown men on social media. Due to her previous trauma, she is at a higher risk of being susceptible to manipulation by a man who takes an interest in her and who might try to exploit her. These are all ways in which we are having to pay attention to trauma and how it manifests itself in our hospitality house.

Strengths-Based Approach

A strengths-based approach to care builds upon a person’s (or organization’s) strengths, noting their resourcefulness and resiliency in difficult and adverse circumstances.192 Developed in the 1980s at the University of Kansas School of Social Welfare,193 it is centered around supporting persons to set and accomplish their own goals (not someone else’s goals). This focus on strengths helped our congregation to determine what we might be good at and where we should put our energy, for example in relation-building. It also helped us to assess our community and determine that Waco did not have the strengths to adequately deal with languages other than English and Spanish.
Therefore, we focused our ministry on Spanish-speakers only. In applying a strengths-based approach to support and care for asylum seekers, it is important to remember that

---

193 University of Kansas, “History of Strengths Perspective at KU,” https://socwel.ku.edu/history-strengths-perspective#:~:text=A%20strengths%2Dbased%20approach%20was,Chamberlain%2C%20Wallace%20Ki sthardt%2C%20W.
immigrants have overcome great obstacles to get to where they arrived, living in a new land. A strengths-based approach builds on this reality and supports the asylum seeker in realizing their own inner strength and resourcefulness. It affirms their inherent dignity and worth and builds upon their talents, skills, and capabilities, seeking to guard against placing a different culture’s goals or priorities onto them.

A strengths-based approach to support is also person-centered, meaning it seeks to make care and support personalized, coordinated, and empowering. It encourages the asylum seeker to take ownership of their care and support, involving them at every step of the way. One of the challenges with this type of approach is that it can be faster in the short term to, for example, make phone calls and appointments for them, rather than going to the home and sitting with them while they make the phone call and navigate the system. Because our goal was building resiliency and empowerment, we learned it is important to take the time in the beginning to teach and walk alongside.

Another awareness revealed in the learning process was that it can be tempting to place our own North American middle-class expectations and goals upon those we support, which is a cultural expectation against which we must guard. They will do things differently than we do, and we must give space for that. Part of being person-centered in support and care also means placing the needs and dignity of the asylum seeker in high priority. This means holding confidences as much as possible, respecting their privacy, and letting them share their story when they wish. Because so many people in the congregation cared about them, their story, and their wellbeing, many naturally asked about how they were doing. This became a challenge to navigate, respecting privacy and confidences in a community living situation and in congregational ministry. We soon realized that it is always important to ask for permission first before sharing or moving forward with anything that relates to guests in the hospitality house.

Cultural Humility

Cultural humility requires critical self-awareness and is a process of ongoing self-reflection and self-critique of one’s own biases and identities while also seeking to note power imbalances and one’s role in them.⁹⁴ Cultural humility seeks to learn from others, recognizing that they are the experts of their own story and their own culture. When someone does something different from what we are accustomed to, we need to be curious and learn. We learned the wisdom of not assuming our way was the “right” way; instead, a humble approach seeks to learn from others. Humility is paramount in any endeavor of ministry, but especially for those who engage different races and ethnicities.

An long-standing ideology that exists in our country is that if immigrants come here, they should adopt the North American way of doing things.⁹⁵ This assumes that “our” way of being and thinking is best and should be adopted, while others’ cultural beliefs and traditions should be left at the border. In helping volunteers identify these subtle patterns of thinking, we found it helpful to brainstorm about some of our cultural beliefs that we may not even recognize, such as our beliefs about education and parental involvement, language, time, family systems, and structures. We did not recognize all our strongly held cultural expectations until we started serving together and began to note the dissonance between “our” way of doing things and “their” way of doing them. We soon learned that anytime there was frustration or concern about how “they” were handling a situation, it became important to stop for a moment and be curious. We asked questions of ourselves, such as: Why am I concerned about this? What is going on in me in this situation? What are my strongly held beliefs here? Then, it became important to wonder about those same questions from the perspective of the immigrant, and to consider what culturally held beliefs of ours might be impacting our visitors. Making space for processing these questions as a team during our work together, before reacting to situations, went a long way in mitigating potentially damaging or hurtful reactions to the guests we were serving.

---

In this chapter, I have described details of how we started and structured the ministry of a hospitality house for asylum seekers. I have briefly touched on the ways that we trained our laity for this ministry, much of which involved new learning and careful attention for those seeking to embark in this type of ministry. The basis of our ministerial approach rested upon our vision to companion the asylum seeker, understanding that each person bears the image of Christ. The calling to accompaniment developed over time, through exposure and study, and was an outpouring of our Christian vocational call to be the hands and feet of Christ in this place. Believing that in the sojourner we would meet Christ, we have looked forward to and sought the transformation of Christ among us. As Oscár Romero so eloquently described, in meeting Christ, we are transfigured. We realized that transformation is both a gift and result of sharing hospitality in this way. We came to believe the North American church needs to meet Christ and we need this transformation of transfiguration. It can be a gift to the church that the pilgrim church has come. Will we receive this gift of transformation?
Chapter 4: Maintaining a House and Ministry

Implementing a vision and leadership for a hospitality house called forth many skills. Just because the sheetrock is up and the shingles are laid, the interior of the home painted and windows put in, does not mean the work is finished. All homeowners experience that a lot of work is required to maintain a house. Homeowners must learn new skills to maintain the upkeep of their home, such as mowing and yard work, touching up paint and repairing holes in walls. Items in the home break and toilets clog. The same applies to maintaining a hospitality house, but the principle applies beyond the physical to emotional, mental, and spiritual maintenance. Building upon Chapter 3 and the vision and calling that guided the creation of a ministry of hospitality, and the additional tools and wisdom learned, this chapter addresses the skills that were called forth from us as we implemented this vision.

Andy Hogue and Gregory Jones argue that it is more important for leaders to be clear about their purpose than it is for them to create a mission or vision statement. Christian institutions often succumb to “mission drift” when they are not clear about their why.\textsuperscript{196} For this reason, I sought to keep our purpose paramount and to avoid getting too specific too soon about the details of what we wanted to do. Our purpose was to accompany the asylum seeker, extending the hospitality and peace of Christ. Flexibility and humility became critical virtues to adopt and skills to practice as the new ministry and endeavor was being birthed.

Engaging in a hospitality ministry with those seeking asylum required our congregations to embody vulnerability in interactions with those who had been traumatized coming to the border. This meant showing deference, gentleness, and humility, while at the same time having healthy boundaries. At DaySpring, we sought to have our imaginations shaped by God’s kingdom vision, always keeping our purpose and goal before us as we companioned asylum seekers in the love of Christ. We had to humbly seek new ways to interact with others and develop new skills.

Jones and Hogue urge leaders to stay close to their purpose and goal, instead of letting the particulars (who, how, where questions) drive the conversation.¹⁹⁷ Allowing purpose to direct leadership frees up the leader to practice innovation and improvisation.¹⁹⁸ Transformative leadership relies upon the purpose and goal to inform actions of practicality and structure. We as a congregation had to be mindful of this as we sought to create systems to sustain this ministry.

The work of ministry and hospitality called forth skills from me as a leader, from our leadership team, and from our congregation. We could prepare for some of these skills that were required of us; others we could not. Some we had to learn along the way. It often felt like we were building the plane as we flew it. As we were building and flying at the same time, from my vantage point as a leader, I was able to see congregants come alive with purpose in ministry.

One of the biggest disciplines I embraced during this leadership experience was to see challenges and obstacles as opportunities. I have been challenged to improvise, listen, ¹⁹⁷ Hogue and Jones, Navigating the Future, 33.

¹⁹⁸ Ibid., 183-190.
and ask questions that get at the heart of the issue. I have had to guard against reacting, for every week there seemed to be pressing and emergent needs to address.

Constraints as Opportunities

After months of praying, planning, and town hall meetings, the steering team was a bit discouraged that the original house offered for sale would not work. Leadership authors Adam Morgan and Mark Barden in A Beautiful Constraint suggest that constraints can often be beneficial and that we should learn how to make them beautiful, advantageous, or constructive. Being able to make this transition from scarcity to opportunity is a key definer of progress.\(^{199}\) I challenged our team to see this constraint of going back to the drawing board in finding a house, as an opportunity. We took time to listen, and I took time to check in with some leaders that I respect, and through this process I believe we were able to refine our vision and become much clearer about what we were wanting to do. In deciding against buying a house, we clarified that we wanted to start out small, seek to build a replicable model, bring others along with us, and stay tethered to our church’s core values (sacred and simple, renewal and rest) as much as possible. We decided we would start out renting a house or a duplex and give ourselves space and room to grow, and then expand later if our vision and desires grew. We wanted to guard against starting too big and then burning out.

This process of clarifying our vision served us well with some of our first challenges. Some of us in the congregation were convinced that the church should start a non-profit to coordinate this ministry. There were several compelling reasons for doing so: it could keep it simpler by allowing a nonprofit to run it, and finances with the church would also be separate. Additionally, it might be easier to seek funding from other congregations and entities if the ministry were a separate nonprofit. These were important questions to listen to, discuss, and explore. Downsides to starting a non-profit would be that it could quickly become complicated (creating a board, applying for 501 c3 status), and it could prevent the church from really taking ownership of it. In the end, we relied on our vision to create a relational space where healing and restoration could happen (tied to one of the church’s core values), but we would begin small and simple (tied to the other core church value). As a team, we decided to lean into the simple and relational aspect, knowing that we could always expand and create a non-profit down the road if we needed to do so. We desired to start a ministry that was a ministry of the congregation.

---

Other congregations with significant constraints were our inspiration for this. As mentioned, San Antonio Mennonite Church is a small church with limited resources, and they ignited our inspiration. For years in Waco, we have served alongside of Cross Ties Ecumenical Church, a Church of the Savior Church that has about twenty members who run two significant ministries in town. One ministry, Talitha Koum, a therapeutic day care, became a nonprofit, and the other is a ministry of the church, The Gospel Café, yet it partners with other churches in town to feed the homeless. This small and committed congregation has done amazing work with limited resources. Their constraints have pushed them to become creative with how they engage with ministry and partner with others. These two congregations expanded our vision for what ministry might look like and how to embrace our constraints and look for the opportunity within them.
One of the keys to being able to transform constraints into opportunities is keeping the ambition high\textsuperscript{200} or keeping our goal and mission at the very forefront of our work. This challenged me to become clear about our goal and be able to communicate that well and often. It was important that the congregation understand our purpose and goal of companioning the asylum seeker. Keeping our purpose in front of us and relying upon the models of these two modest churches helped us from the beginning to transform the constraint of time and energy from the congregation.

In addition to time being a constraint, in some ways our church motto, “sacred and simple,” seemed prohibitive to some of engaging in the messy and particularly human work of a hospitality house with asylum seekers. I heard often, “this is not simple.” If one thinks of simple as being not-complicated, then yes, opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers is not simple. If one understands simple to mean removing all things that distract from what is sacred, distilling faith down to the essentials, then yes, opening a hospitality house for asylum seekers can be simple. It is a simple expression of what it means to follow Christ; it is at the heart of orthopraxy. Distinguishing and re-storying what “sacred and simple” meant was an important part of our conversations. We also needed to tie in this ministry with the core founding beliefs of the congregation so that the hospitality house was an extension of who DaySpring has always been. We have always been a place of healing and rest for weary souls, and a place of recovering faith that has been broken or exhausted. For us, the pilgrim church at our southern border epitomized those in need of restoration and rest.

\textsuperscript{200} Hogue and Jones, \textit{Navigating the Future}, 59.
Propelling questions have both a “bold ambition and significant constraint linked together”\textsuperscript{201} and were a part of our clearly stated goals early on. A propelling question or goal for this hospitality and community home was, “How can we as a congregation create intentional Christian community and hospitality for the immigrant with our current full schedules and over busy lives?” Questions like this address the often-unvoiced concerns and constraints head on, seeking to find a way through them together. It links constraints with goals and challenges leadership to be creative in moving forward. Morgan and Barden suggest that the “constraint is what we must use as a key parameter to meet this stretching ambition.”\textsuperscript{202} Given this statement, spending time with significant constraints by thinking about and exploring them, can be the key to linking them with ambitions and goals.

Our ambition was one of impact, which was rooted in a desire to minister to the alien, to those suffering and seeking a better life. It was a weighty prospect with a significant constraint (time and resources) that had constantly been a stumbling block to our “progress” in ministry in years past. I believe this process of examining our constraints helped us to be clearer about our goals and ambitions in a way that inspired the congregation in ways not previously experienced before. When a congregation is on the precipice of a new experience in uncharted waters, it requires all the skills and creativity leaders can muster. Leaders must face constraints head on and seek to transform them into opportunities.

In \textit{Navigating the Future}, Gregory Jones and Andy Hogue liken leadership to playing jazz. A good jazz musician has a strong foundation from which to improvise, \textsuperscript{201} Hogue and Jones, \textit{Navigating the Future}, 59.

\textsuperscript{202} Morgan and Barden, \textit{A Beautiful Constraint}, 65.
adapt, and adjust. Instead of creating mission statements that prescribe where an organization is headed, it suggests that for leaders today, change happens so rapidly that organizations need to be nimble, able to adapt, quick on their feet, and guided by their vision. Flexibility and humility are paramount in leading an organization to create a new endeavor of a hospitality house. Flexibility allows leadership to adjust to constraints and find ways to transform them. Humility must be demonstrated at every step along the way, but it is especially critical as leadership addresses constraints and concerns and seeks to move around them while bringing people along and strengthening relational capital.

Leadership for Ministry

As this ministry unfolded certain skills and leadership tools were called forth, both personally and from the congregation, we learned that leadership requires teachability. In addition to learning to view constraints as opportunities, I had to learn how to navigate and lead a ministry with many different emotionally invested leaders and participants. Letty Russell in Just Hospitality writes “[t]he ministry of service to humankind is the ministry of God in Christ reconciling the world.” This ministry is not ours; it is God’s. Conversely, this ministry is not mine but the church’s; this is the body of Christ in action. Even though I have been an instrumental part in the vision, creation, planning, foundation laying, building, framing, and maintenance, I often had to tell myself that his ministry was not my own, that it was the ministry of the church. I needed to let it go differently than I thought it needed to go at times. The minister’s job is to equip saints for ministry in the world, this was so much of my job. I constantly had to discern when to let go and let others lead and when to gently guide or step in and interject.

---

203 Hogue and Jones, 185.

A leader is someone who influences the ethos of some part of the world, be it a workplace, congregation, or even a family. Leaders can create an atmosphere of trust and positivity, of humility and building upon strengths, which then becomes a place of flourishing. Or, on the contrary, they can create systems of fear and distrust where unhealthy boundaries are evident. Parker Palmer suggests that leaders must attend to their own shadows if they are to be effective leaders. This is where the work of spiritual formation for the leader is crucial. Leadership is a spiritual journey, which makes it perilous for leaders to neglect their own spiritual formation and mental well-being.

Transformative Leadership

Ongoing learning in our process revealed that, in Jesus Christ, three aspects of leadership are fully developed and realized, that of prophet, priest, and king. The munus triplex, or threefold office of Old Testament leadership (prophet, priest, and king) remains a guiding framework for Christian leaders today. Prophets in the Old Testament cast a vision for what life in the kingdom of God should be, then called the people of God back to a God-centered life, which always included justice. Prophetic leadership is imaginative, seeing through the fog, calling the people of God to a better way.

We realized the importance of considering how leaders might cast a vision for the congregation, of how they might embody Christ’s companionship with the stranger and the outsider. This can be done through preaching, in pastoral prayers and liturgy, and through education. In pastoral prayers and preaching, ministers call followers to notice the unnoticed and to engage with those who suffer. This is part of prophetic leadership. Shame and guilt are de-motivating and must be guarded against; however, there are plenty of ways to be provocatively imaginative without the harshness sometimes seen in the prophets of old. Prophetic leadership sees what God is doing in the world, calls the people of God back to God, and challenges them to engage their faith.

---

Priestly leadership is also one of vision. The priest sees the divine in the ordinary acts of life; the priest brings God to the people. Priestly ministry is vulnerable, relational, and sacrificial or kenotic. Christ emptied himself for us (Philippians 2:7) as the ultimate act of priestly leadership. The incarnation and crucifixion exemplify priestly leadership. Christ came to walk among the suffering of the earth, exposed like us to the pain and indignities of humanity. Priestly leadership is vulnerable, faces suffering, and is changed by the suffering. Ultimately, Christ’s vulnerability redeemed the suffering for all humankind through the cross and resurrection.

We understood that the church’s engagement with the asylum seeker is relational and results in being stretched and changed. As leaders seeking to nurture the faith of the congregation toward being authentic followers of Christ, we were reminded to pay attention to the inner work that God needs to do in hearts and to the outer work toward which God calls us all. It is both inner and outer, as Parker Palmer suggests, and it requires vulnerability. James McLendon also highlights leaders whose transformational leadership was birthed out of a “theology of character” as a reminder of this vulnerable task. God’s work flowed out of their internal character development, highlighting the importance of attending to our own inner work in preparation for ministry and service.

---

209 Palmer, “Leadership Begins Within.”

As Christians seeking to embody the love of Christ in ministry to the stranger and with the suffering, we experienced internal renewal, a necessary transformation for God’s people. This required practicing vulnerability while learning to walk with those who suffer. It was messy as lives were exposed to pain, frustration, and some level of chaos. Our church prided itself on being “sacred and simple” and yet, as noted, ministry with the suffering by nature is complicated. It impacts everything, including worship. How can a leader prepare for that? In communicating the vision for the congregation, we encouraged openness to grow, learning from mistakes, and finding God in new and unexpected ways.

Kingly or royal leadership is also transformative, seeking to establish God’s kingdom on earth. It is a kingdom where the last shall be first, and Christ triumphs in death. This kind of royal leadership asks, “How can the church be God’s instrument to bring about the kingdom of God?” It is an all-encompassing form of leadership that looks for the well-being of the people, seeking to establish a structure that supports well-being and human flourishing.

Throughout this process of developing a vision for a hospitality house, we strove to keep in mind the needs of those the church serves as well as the individual needs of congregants. Ministry of this type can be draining and discouraging at times and wonderful on other occasions. We learned to find ways to create structure and accountability so that the burdens did not just fall on the shoulders of a couple of people.

---

210 McClendon, Biography as Theology, 2.
211 For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for My sake and for the gospel will save it (Mark 8:35). The last shall be first and the first shall be last (Matthew 20:16).
212 See also Kraybill, The Upside-Down Kingdom, and Navone, Triumph Through Failure.
The emotional and spiritual health of everyone involved, not just the ones being served, is important to attend to. Imaginative, vulnerable, and transformative leadership are skills that we have had to learn on this leadership journey. Some of these skills were not intuitive, such as humility, vulnerability, and patience while seeking transformation. In working with our congregation, we experienced many different imaginations and ideas for how to go about the same calling and vision. This is where the work of humility, community, and listening all come together to forge a path forward.

Adaptive Leadership

In our preparation research, we learned that adaptive leadership, according to Todd Bolsinger in Canoeing the Mountains, is about energizing a community toward their own transformation to accomplish a shared mission. This transformation must involve listening to the marginal voices. Bolsinger provides the example of how explorers Lewis and Clark’s survival depended upon listening to Sacagawea in their uncharted explorations. Listening to marginal voices empowers the community by helping them recognize their value and their own influence.\(^{213}\) It is about elevating leadership and calling out gifts in one another. Faithful adaptive leadership empowers others to see their liabilities as their assets and looks for the marginal voices in the congregation. It involves listening to those who are minorities, to those in the immigrant community, and learning from them and their lived experiences. This will only strengthen the church’s ministry.

Part of adaptive leadership is being able to say “yes, and” while also seeking to ask the best questions. “Yes, and” is a guideline in improvisational comedy. Hogue and \(^{213}\) Bolsinger, Canoeing the Mountains, 193.

Jones in Navigating the Future highlight the importance of improvisation in leadership in this new millennium. In improv comedy, the comedian is trained to take what is given to them and then improvise and add to it, essentially saying “yes, and.” The comedian does not know where the skit will land but improvises on the spot.\textsuperscript{214} Similarly, in ministry leadership, something new and creative presents itself daily. Listening to and understanding concerns and ideas is an important part of addressing roadblocks and constraints on the spot.

With the divergent culture becoming our norm,\textsuperscript{215} a renewed vision for Christian leadership is needed, one that is relational, empowering, and courageous. In this new era of learning to navigate the post-Christendom waters off the map, the church and its leaders must ask, “What is God doing and how might God be inviting us?” This work of discerning God’s guidance and direction requires that we as leaders and as the church, attend first to our own relationship with God. This is personal but also more importantly in the context of leadership in the church, it is communal. Effective and adaptive Christian leadership can use the tools and gifts of spiritual direction, which help find opportunity in challenge, facilitate honest community and relationships, and enhance our spiritual growth. These are unprecedented times for the church; however, we have the tools we need and the learned experiences of those who have been overlooked that can help guide the church to adapt and live into its calling to be the people of God for the sake of the world.

This journal entry below describes a time in which I needed to adapt my leadership, to listen to the marginal voices around me, and I was better for it. I invited a \textsuperscript{214} Hogue and Jones, Navigating the Future, 185-190.

\textsuperscript{215} Willimon, Leading with the Sermon, 25.
Latina woman who was only slightly involved in the congregation to visit with me. I wanted her perspective, and I extended an invitation to help us lead this ministry.

Journal: Welcome Dinner

“How are you going to welcome the families? What will they eat for their first meal?” One of the native Spanish speakers involved in our ministry asked me this question. We are opening a hospitality house; some call them welcome houses. Our whole goal is to welcome. She also told me that sometimes it is hard for her to come to our church when no one else at the church looks like her. We met for coffee because I wanted to hear her perspective. I wanted her thoughts on how we might extend hospitality. We have a welcome bag for each guest and some clothes in their drawers, a stuffed animal for each child and a handmade blanket. “You need their first meal to be comfort food, food from their country. I’ll make it. Just let me know where they are from, and I’ll make the food and bring it.” Brilliant idea. I am so glad that I reached out to her to hear her ideas and perspective. She has been an invaluable partner in this ministry. We have learned a lot from her and in turn our ministry is better.

Group Dynamics

Another aspect of ongoing learning involved studying the life cycle of a group, for many factors influence how a group functions. One constraint with leading in a congregation is that everyone is a “volunteer,” in addition to their own vocations and family responsibilities. The opportunity found within this constraint is that because it is voluntary, there is sometimes a higher degree of passion for the work. The life cycle of a group model explains that as a group or team develops maturity and stability, and relationships are formed, the leadership style can morph or change to a more collaborative or shared leadership. The cycle moves from forming, storming, norming, performing to adjourning.²¹⁶ In our own work with the ministry of the Naomi House, I had to take a stronger leadership role for our ministry team in the beginning. In that time,

---

²¹⁶ For more on Tuckman’s Life Cycle of the Group, see “Tuckman’s Stages of Group Development,” https://www.wcupa.edu/coral/tuckmanStagesGroupDevelopment.aspx#:~:text=These%20stages%20are%20commonly%20known,more%20collaborative%20or%20shared%20leadership.
I modeled collaboration, a strengths-based approach, and set boundaries by not attempting to meet every need that arose with our asylee neighbors in the house.

In the forming stage group members are new, trying to understand their roles and that of the team. They are adjusting to personalities and what is most likely quite a new ministry experience. In this stage, teams are trying to assess needs and establish boundaries of what their team can do and how much they can personally give. In the storming stage, groups work to get organized, developing tasks and processes to meet needs. Conflicts arise as passions are high and clarity is still developing. During the norming phase, some experiences give way to establishing better ways of doing and being together. Leadership becomes more shared, and a higher level of trust is established. This is a period of high creativity and collaboration. The performing stage is marked by true interdependence and flexibility. It is adaptable and highly productive. In the adjourning stage, there is a significant change in the structure and people move on or take breaks. This is a time to think purposefully about how to successfully onboard new team members and reform.²¹⁷

Conflict is inevitable in any group work, and our church was no different. In our new ministry, there was often a high level of investment and emotional connection. Learning about conflict management was a necessity as well as developing healthy patterns of communication for the ministry team. This necessarily starts at the top, with leaders modeling humility and listening. When tensions were high, it was important to remind the team that, for many of them, this type of ministry was a holy calling. It was helpful to practice having generous assumptions and modeling trust within the group.

²¹⁷ "Tuckman’s Stages of Group Development."
Despite this, there were times in which negativity became detrimental to the group work. Therefore, we learned the importance of creating healthy feedback loops that allowed ministry team members to share concerns, ideas, or feedback in non-threatening ways. We provided opportunities for team members to share ideas and then “park ideas” in “parking lots,” so to say, and come back to them. Tuckman encourages avoiding backchat, talking about others or leaders or problems behind others’ backs. This only leads to confusion and misunderstandings, and it destroys trust. Susan Beaumont exhorts to not allow negativity to fester, and instead encourage team members to go straight to the source for clarification.218

Communication was essential as the team developed, and as the church embarked on our new endeavor. We saw the need to keep retelling the story, even though it had been said before, as new people, who do not know the history of the church, the history of the process, or the vision, continually join the congregation.

Spiritual Formation for Flourishing

Beaumont, in How to Lead When You Don’t Know Where You Are Going, urges leaders to tend to the soul of the institution as they lead by: 1) listening, 2) attending to discernment together by paying attention to what God is doing within the congregation, 3) paying attention to the collectives stories that are told about past and present, and 4) considering how that impacts the emerging stories for a hope-filled future.219 She urges church leaders to pay attention to their soul work individually and corporately, seeking ways to attend to the guidance of the Holy Spirit. She uses the framework of spiritual direction to guide her style of leadership. Spiritual direction often asks such questions as, “Who are we?” “What is God calling us (or me) to do, to be, to believe, to become?” “Who are we here to serve?”

---

218 “Tuckman’s Stages of Group Development.” See also “Social Psychology Online Resources.”

In paying attention to soul care of individuals and congregations, we also learned that it is imperative to remember rest and sabbath. Ministry with the asylum seekers, with those on the margins of society who are reduced to bare life, is too important for burnout. Ministers and lay leaders must attend to their own needs and souls to maintain longevity in this important work.

In Emotional Intelligence for Religious Leaders, authors John West, Roy Oswald, and Nadyne Guzman address equipping ministers for longevity in ministry. Emotional self-awareness is crucial to being able to lead by influence because this type of leadership flows out of the core of who leaders are; it relies upon their own sincerity. There is no way to “fake it”; therefore, we must spend the time and energy to be spiritually grounded and emotionally healthy.

A series of townhall meetings gave the congregation and the steering team opportunities to diffuse tension and anxiety. It was important to listen to people’s concerns, take them seriously, and invite them in the process, even when those planning have already thought of and addressed the concerns. At these townhall conversations, each table recorded their hopes and concerns about the project. In subsequent meetings, church members divided into groups to think through and address specific components of the ministry such as church engagement, hospitality, community living, finances, training and equipping, immigration concerns, and information. These subgroups spent time thinking, asking important questions, and doing research, after which they reported back to the larger team.

---

Longevity and Replication

Keeping our end goals in mind, to accompany the asylum seeker and to create a replicable model, have helped the ministry team stay focused. Articulating clear goals empowered our ministry teams to say no when necessary. Burnout is commonplace in ministry, especially in ministries of this sort, but the work is too important to burnout in two years. Setting clear boundaries about what the ministry could and could not do was crucial. It was also important for individuals to have a clear sense of their own boundaries. Many well-meaning people have been sucked into the black hole of serving in ways that are more “doing for” than “doing with.” Steve Corbett and Brian Fikkert warn against this type of paternalism, writing: “Do not do things for people that they can do for themselves.”221 We learned that unintentional “doing for” others can lead to frustrated and overworked volunteers or church members and frustrated and unempowered guests in the hospitality house. Susanna Snyder cautions those serving with immigrants that there are ways to give that can fill their hands but break their spirits. Some benign ways of giving can be destructive. Mutuality needs to be at the center of all encounters between Christians and immigrants, in such a way that leads to relationship and friendship.222 Avoiding paternalism is crucial for both longevity in ministry and creating a replicable model.

---

John Wesley’s three simple rules are instructive for all Christians and often used as a part of baptismal services. They are also especially prudent for those in ministry of this sort: “Do no harm. Do good. Stay in love with Jesus.” In “doing no harm,” we ask if this action or policy will do harm, whether intentional or not. Sometimes actions can be harmful when we disregard other’s feelings or needs, when we do “for” and not “with,” or when we are compelled by compassion without some forethought. For example, if there is a dog on the side of the interstate, a compassionate heart might immediately stop to grab the dog without thinking first about how to do it in the safest way possible so as not to endanger other drivers. Sometimes, our quest to do good can lead to harm if we are not thoughtful about what and how we are doing.

As a part of the baptismal covenant in many traditions, the admonition, “Do good” is followed by, “We will, with God’s help.” Seeking God’s best for others is at the heart of both ministry and the Christian life. Sometimes our ideas of what is good and right may not be exactly lined up with what God sees as good and right. The only ways to mitigate this are to stay tethered to Christian community, and to experience God through Scripture, worship, and prayer. The goodness that the Christian life produces are the good fruits of a life filled with the Holy Spirit.

“Stay in love with Jesus” is essential for all who serve Christ in ministry of this sort. It is imperative to attend to one’s own spiritual growth, health, and development. It is so easy to get caught up in doing good, that one becomes worn out, exhausted, jaded, and bitter. Christians must make their spiritual and emotional health a priority; it is the very sustenance that we all need. Flight attendants have it right—in case of an emergency, put on our oxygen masks first before helping others do the same, especially children.

---

We came to see that ministry with those in poverty and crisis can quickly become complicated. We learned, as much as possible, to keep things simple, paired down, and basic, and to set boundaries whenever possible. Saying no and avoiding trying to be all things to all people helps prevent burnout, which is hard to do in crisis related ministries, but it is necessary for longevity and replication.

Worship and Liturgy

The word liturgy means “the work of the people.”224 Through our liturgy, we work out our theology and our faith, speaking and singing what we know until we believe it in our hearts. Our liturgy shapes us and molds us in Christlikeness. Isaac Villegas wrote about performing liturgies for those who died crossing the U.S. Mexico border in Arizona, noting that their liturgy is the labor of a group in service to the community, saying: “Our liturgy is for the community of the dead, to join our lives to theirs in a remembering.”225 Liturgy teaches, remembers, forms, and shapes us. It teaches us to draw all things into the presence of Christ who is with us. In liturgy, we worship God in the ordinary moments, making sacred and holy all that is normal and routine.

Worship is the primary means through which the church teaches and spiritually forms the congregation. As leaders and ministers, we must consider how worship leads the people of God to embrace the calling of God to be God’s ambassadors of peace and mercy. The hymns that are sung, Scriptures read, and prayers offered all play a part in 224 See the appendix for resources.

---

225 Villegas, “A Liturgy in the Borderlands.”
forming the Christian soul and heart. The simplest place to begin is by including responsive readings or litanies from the Psalms and prophets. Responsive readings engage the congregation as they repeat the words of God, layering the learning from hearing and speaking. We should not shy away from Psalms of lament, either. Some of the harder, or more raw passages are an important part in helping laity to identify their own suffering and loss. This is a crucial step to beginning to embrace those who are suffering. Submitting to the entirety of Scripture, specifically the Psalter and the prophets, forms congregants in seeing God’s heart for the suffering, for mercy and justice.

In sum, a key virtue that was called forth from us in this work was humility. For Augustine, humility is the central Christian virtue and the “antidote to pride” and is central to being able to understand justice.226 Humility can grow as the Holy Spirit transforms listeners through the hearing of Scripture in worship situated within a practicing Christian community. Worship is the primary means through which Christians are formed and shaped for ministry in the world and can be an integral part in developing hearts for ministry.

226 Bretherton, Christianity and Contemporary Politics, 143-44.
Chapter 5. Conclusion: Theological and Pastoral Reflection

In conclusion, I want to offer a theological and ministerial perspective that will give this type of ministry a robust depth as churches seek to embody Christ’s love and presence. Following Christ’s life and teachings, to be the dynamic people of God more fully, we must extend ourselves on behalf of the “least of these,” the poor and needy, the stranger, and those overlooked. In doing this, the church can encounter God, for the poor are fitting vessels for God’s presence and power.227 It is necessary for our faith growth, and it is necessary for all those who suffer, that the church would it extend itself in this way as a part of denying self, taking up our cross, and following Christ. Cardinal Joseph W. Tobin sums up the immigration predicament for the church today: “Refugees and migrants risk losing their lives. The rest of us could lose our souls.”228 In serving the refugee, the church may well find itself anew, as it rediscovers and lives into its purpose and telos.

Bearing Witness

How should a congregation reflect theologically on the work of hospitality ministry with asylum seekers? Two words that give voice to many different approaches to incarnational ministry are presence and witness. The image that has become paramount to my theological understanding of this ministry is that of bearing witness. We seek to be present to others as God is present to us and we are bearing witness to the continual work of the Holy Spirit among us. Through a ministry of presence, we also bear witness to the pain and suffering of our neighbors who come seeking refuge. This bearing witness is a holy task. The pilgrim church is knocking at our door asking for help. When we believe that we meet Christ in the stranger, and when we believe that we are transformed by looking into the face of Christ as in the transfiguration, then we understand that this work is about bearing witness to God’s work among us. We do not create the bounty, but the Holy Spirit does. We create space for trauma healing, we open our hearts, our homes, and our congregation in hospitality, and God moves.

228 Pope Francis, A Stranger and You Welcomed Me, xiii.

Witnessing automatically implies a relationship. It gives voice to the suffering so that the one suffering knows they are not alone. Seeing and being with in the suffering is an act of compassion and care. Hospitable witnessing makes space for the story to unfold; it is a way of bearing witness to pain and joy. It is a ministry of presence that embodies the presence of Christ. Reverend Sam Wells came to this same realization through his work with those experiencing homelessness in London. He suggests that the heart of so many of our breakdowns in relationships and in society hinges on “being with” others instead of being or doing “for.”

“Wicked problems” such as homelessness, for example, are social or cultural problems that are almost too difficult to solve because of their complexity. They lack clarity in their aims or pursuits. Wells asserts that being with is expressly rooted in the gospel, for Emmanuel means “God with us.” In John 1:14, the Word, Christ, became flesh and lived with humanity. The temptation to fix and to do for others is pervasive and enticing. Ministers, parents, and advocates become so busy doing for others, that they neglect to simply be with them. Neglecting relationship building is so easy to do, because this is the more uncomfortable and challenging work. It requires time and vulnerability, it is not often up front, and it does not garner much praise and attention.

229 Oh, Hospitable Witnessing, 1.

With Christ as guide, being with is an important lens through which to view and fashion a ministry with asylum seekers. A ministry of presence or being with sets the foundation for being able to bear witness to and lament with the immigrant. It creates space for God’s work of redeeming pain and brokenness to flourish.

Witnessing is a communal act that makes room for the voice of the suffering. Hospitable witnessing attends with compassion and care and seeks to stand in solidarity with those who are suffering. French philosopher Simone Weil made “attention” (l’attention) a fundamental component of her work. Paying deep attention, for Weil, is arduous but leads to discernment. This type of attention “includes discerning what someone is going through in her or his suffering” with a posture of readiness to receive what it is that God or the object of the attention has to offer. This type of attention-keeping is part of what it means to bear witness with the asylum seeker. It means spending time with, listening to, walking alongside of, and gazing into their lives, ready to receive and learn from them. In doing so, we will encounter God in new ways, for we trust that God will meet us in this moment, enabling us to bear witness to God’s work in and around the immigrant.

232 Oh, Hospitable Witnessing, 8.
We encounter the hospitable God of Scripture as we open ourselves to the work of the Holy Spirit in and around us in the asylum seeker. Smither traces a thread of missional hospitality throughout Scripture and through Christian history. It is this radical and ordinary hospitality that creates an environment of faithful presence, listening, and mutuality in which God is known and made known. It well may be the antidote to our postmodern, cynical culture that sees no need for the church.

As leaders, we are called to bear witness to the reign of God. This is complex, and to do so, we must imagine beyond what we can see. The church cannot engage the world as the hands and feet of Christ without a robust spiritual imagination. North American culture’s crisis of imagination has been fueled by dualistic thinking and rapidly changing cultural mores so that Christians are left confused seeing no viable answers or solutions to the complex problems of today. Dualistic thinking is binary thinking or often what some call “black and white thinking;” us versus them, good versus bad. In our politics and in our churches, it often demonizes the other and can impede bridge building and creativity. As leaders, we ought not get bogged down in what often feels like the traps of dualistic thinking and cultural battles; rather, we would do well to seek creative solutions to difficult predicaments. We must guard against letting culture influence our discipleship and orthopraxy. Caring for immigrants and the vulnerable is clearly a scriptural mandate that the church must continue to enact. Dualistic thinking is prevalent in the political discourse about immigration. There is an inability to see for example, how our laws could be compassionate and yet also secure the border. Solutions to complex problems such as immigration require courage, creativity, and collaboration. The church is blessed with rich theological resources in Scripture and tradition that have the power to challenge and transform dominant cultural discourses in ways that offer solutions to “wicked” problems. Fostering creativity has been a critical part of developing the ministry of the Naomi House. We focused on strengths, listened, learned, and leaned in. As we bear witness and pay attention to the immigrant, we may just find that new and creative options exist. We may receive energy, and the church may be enlivened by this prolonged, open-hearted gaze.

235 For a good literature review of current work on biblical hospitality from all angles, see Smither’s first chapter of Mission as Hospitality.

When one thinks about bearing witness, one might traditionally think of evangelism and attesting to the reign of God. In my context, witnessing is about receiving and being with, in which space we learn to see what God is doing around us. We get to witness God’s healing work around us. We pray, “Lord may your kingdom come, may your will be done, on earth as it is in heaven,” and when we do so we are acknowledging that God’s work is happening now. It is often hard to see, and so our challenge is to learn to see it. A failure of imagination can cause the North American church to miss the pilgrim church that has come to the border, potentially offering a fresh expression of faith and dependency upon the suffering Christ. It is pure gift to watch the work of God in restoring brokenness and bringing a family back to life. There is no credit in this for the hospitality house or church members, or the church. It is purely the work of the Holy Spirit that we witness. In opening oneself up to relationships, in opening a hospitality house, the church gets a front-row seat to God’s work of healing and restoration. It is God at work in ways that are not always obvious in our insulated and distracted lives. Bearing witness requires a reorientation of life, a slowing down and making space for relationships, for the sharing of stories, and for God’s work to unfold. It is not always expedient or efficient, and it can be messy. These may be some of the biggest barriers to encountering God in this way. It does not always fit into our neatly devised categories and time slots.

In Life Together, Bonhoeffer makes the case that Christians must live out their faith in community that has at its center participating in the transformation of God’s world. Christian community always meets the felt needs of the hurting world, in which we greet the sick, the prisoner, and those in “exile” as if they are Christ. This is a weighty reality and yet, conversely, both the companioned and the one companioning find that they “recognize in each other the Christ who is present in the body . . . they receive and meet each other as one receives the presence of the Lord.”237 Humility, meekness, and forbearance are forged in the hard work of building relationships. It is not a rosy picture of life together, but rather one marked with challenge and joy, patterned after the life of Christ.238 Bonhoeffer goes on to describe how Jesus Christ is our brother and we are to receive others as his and our brothers, forgiving and restoring just as Christ has done for us. Expounding on Romans 15:17, we are to meet others as he has met us.239 This is a sobering reminder of the challenges of life together and the gift of meeting Christ in the midst of this discipline of building community.

Romero’s response to the endemic and dominating violence in El Salvador was liberation or freedom found in the transfiguration of Christ. Salvation means

---

238 Ibid., chapter 5 “Ministry.”
239 Ibid., 25.
transfiguration: all who encounter Christ are changed and liberated to bring the “light of Christ to all men,” imparting dignity and hope and reinvigorating vocation. 240 This same transfiguration is for all today who will gaze long enough at Christ whose face is also found in the immigrant today. This is the gift of bearing witness to God’s activity in the life of the foreigner or stranger.

Cardinal Joseph Tobin, in the introduction to Pope Francis’ collection of homilies, A Stranger and You Welcomed Me, wonders about the rising level of despair reflected in the U.S.’s high suicide and violence rates and the connection with a growing hardness of heart toward the plight of immigrants. He writes, “Failure to recognize and respond to hope hardens our hearts and disfigures our faces.” 241 Is it possible that Americans’ failure to engage in care hardens us and leads to despair?

St. Bernard of Clairvaux and St. Catherine of Sienna both address the need for God’s work of renewal and conviction in our own hearts, for if we cannot see or be in touch with our own suffering and need for mercy, then we cannot extend mercy. Pope Francis made a similar point: “The more conscious we are of our wretchedness and our sins, the more we experience the love and infinite mercy of God among us, and the more capable we are of looking upon the many ‘wounded’ we meet along the way with acceptance and mercy.” 242 Receiving God’s mercy in all its fullness enables us to give that same mercy away. Having experienced suffering, we are more prone to have compassion on the suffering. The engagement, or lack thereof, of the Christian church with those who suffer, with asylum seekers specifically, is directly related to our spiritual 240 Colón-Emeric, Óscar Romero's Theological Vision, 76.

241 Pope Francis, A Stranger and You Welcomed Me, xiv.
formation. When the church does not engage in extending mercy and justice, it is a sign of inward spiritual atrophy and soul malformation.

Weil’s deep gaze or attention upon those who suffer can lead or move God’s people to action in solidarity with those who have suffered trauma. This deep attention is fertile ground for hospitality and hospitable witness. Priscilla Oh suggests three Christian practices that embody hospitable witnessing: care for others as made in the image of God, compassion as being present with those suffering, and lament as a way to give voice to the suffering and move all towards hope.243

Lament is the spiritual practice in which we seek to discover how God is present amid painful realities of trauma, calamity, and violence. Nina Balmaceda observes that “Lament is the school of authentic hope”244 and is a crucial part of opening the heart’s door to healing. Lament creates space for spiritual communication with God and can help prevent feelings of isolation, especially when it is used in a corporate setting. It can be a discipline to create space in our liturgy and in our prayers to express sorrow over all that has gone wrong. Why is this important? Lament reminds us to face reality and to bring the healing presence of Christ into our areas of pain.245

Carlos Colón, a modern liturgist, and hymn writer, originally from El Salvador, writes music and prayers that express the laments of refugees and asylum seekers.

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Veo violencia en la ciudad,} \\
\text{violencia y discordia.} \\
\text{Veo violencia en la ciudad.} \\
\text{Senor, ten Piedad.} \\
\text{I see unrest in the city streets;} \\
\text{discord and suff’ring flourish.} \end{align*}
\]

243 Priscilla Sun Kyung Oh, 13-16.
244 Balmaceda, “The Word Made Flesh.”
245 For more on recovering lament as a practice, see Kristin M. Swenson, Living Through Pain: Psalms and the Search for Wholeness (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005).
Violence and fear strike a constant beat.
Have mercy, O Lord!

Escucha, Oh Dios, mi oracion;
Oye la voz de me ruego.
Mira attento nuestra oppression,
ven y rescata a tu pueblo. 246

Hear, O God, my prayer;
Hear our voice, I beg of you.
Look carefully at our oppression, come and rescue your people.

Hymns and songs of lament are not often sung in worship, nor are they even easy to find. This hymn gives voice to the laments of so many who come to our nation’s southern border seeking refuge and asylum. Lament is scriptural and is a discipline that can be enlivening, opening the door for the healing and reconciling work of the Holy Spirit.

We do not have to gaze too long to be overwhelmed by all there is to lament. In lament, we bear witness to what is happening and give voice to it. We sit with it and let the Holy Spirit work in us through it. This is hard: we are often compelled to jump in and fix it, or to gloss over the pain and focus on the positive, or to avoid and neglect the sorrow. It is uncomfortable, but what if in the discomfort and in the voicing of our pain and lament, of our anger and hurt, we might discover something new? In opening our hearts in lament to God, we may find a new freedom from the pain and a path to God’s inbreaking healing and restoration in our own lives, and in the world. Scripture provides many healthy examples of lament from the Psalms to Job to Naomi, who changed her name to Maura, meaning bitter, to Jesus on the cross crying out, “My God, why have you forsaken me?” (Matthew 27:46; Psalm 122). Our Christian tradition teaches us to lament, 246 Colon, Veo Violencia en la Ciudad.

to cry out to God, and doing so often opens doors for courage to grow and for healing to begin.

Accompanying the asylum seeker in mutuality and humility creates space for relationships to flourish. In doing so, we catch glimpses of the Holy Spirit at work reconciling and healing. Bearing witness to the work of God among those seeking refuge is a balm that soothes those weary with lament. God’s inbreaking kingdom, God’s new creation is nowhere more evident than in ministry with those seeking refuge and asylum. Maybe this is because God chose to align with immigrants, by coming as a child and living the life of one seeking refuge. Our destination on this journey of life is God’s kingdom, where all are welcomed to the banquet table, where every nation and tongue will praise God together. On this earth, the church is Christ’s body helping bring about this beautiful vision and calling, which is already and not yet. God is drawing all people in, but it is not yet fully realized. This is where we are going.

Where is the hope? In our work with the Naomi House, we have had a front row seat to God’s work of healing and restoration in broken lives and hurting families. We have seen hearts once opposed to God transformed by God’s grace and enduring presence in the pain. We have seen an invigorated and enlivened faith in our congregants. We have experienced those who were once worn out and turned off by religion finding new meaning and reconciliation with God. We have seen traumatized families find their footing through the loving arms of the Christian community. We have seen churches of all denominations and ideology rally together in ministry. We have a new hope. Nina Balmaceda, with the Center for Reconciliation, shares that the virtue of hope is sometimes likened to a mother who has two daughters: anger and courage. Anger at the way things are, and courage to see that things can change.247 Anger that has been transformed through lament can lead to courage to change terrible realities. Bearing witness with our fellow pilgrims seeking safety and refuge is the beginning to uncovering new ways of encountering God, which is precisely what the church needs in the continual unfolding of God’s inbreaking kingdom in our present reality.

Congregations who embark on the journey of companioning asylum seekers stand on a solid biblical foundation of welcoming the stranger and offering hospitality to the foreigner. Throughout the history of the church, Christians have cared for the poor and the overlooked, and in fact, it has been one of the defining aspects of Christianity that has shaped culture and set the church apart from other institutions. Christians have exhibited courageous leadership in caring for the persecuted, the refugee, the overlooked, and the neglected. Churches seeking to build a ministry of accompaniment with asylum seekers have much to offer their congregation in the way of teaching and training for this ministry. Even in our culture of polarization, ministry of this sort is possible, and it is enlivening for the church caught in the sea change of post-Christendom.

Leadership in this era of the church requires new skills of adaptation to rise to the challenge of moving forward in creatively sharing the hope and love of Christ. In an era of unprecedented mass migration that will only continue to increase due to climate and governmental turmoil, the church must find a way to engage this crisis in a way that leads to life, restoration, and hope for the millions who are seeking refuge and safety all over the world. In doing so, a gift awaits the church, which is the chance to bear witness to and participate in God’s work of healing, reconciling, and restoring lives. It is a gift that will

247 At times this quote has been attributed to St. Augustine, but it has recently been disputed. See also Balmaceda, “The Word Made Flesh.” enliven and invigorate the church if we will let it. The only requirement is that we show up and open our hearts in hospitality echoing the words of Mary, “I am the servant of the Lord. May it be unto me according to your word." God is at work, and the pilgrim church is here, knocking on our doors.

---

248 Luke 1:38
Appendix I
Questions for Reflection

Chapter 2: Laying the Foundation

The resource of guiding questions listed below for chapters 2-5 can be employed by congregations in developing their own programming around these issues. They can also be used for group discussion and personal reflection after reading the material of each chapter. They can be very useful for a team or congregational leaders exploring a calling to extending hospitality to asylum seekers.

Part 1: Pastoral and Theological Preparation: Equipping the Leader/Minister

- How have you experienced hospitality? Describe different kinds of hospitality that have been shared with you or that you shared with another?
- How does the understanding of the imago Dei impact how you see others?
- Find a hospitality or welcome house near you and visit it. Listen and learn from them.
- What practices help foster hospitality?
- What are some practices you can adopt to train yourself and your community to practice hospitality?
- How does your theological lens propel you to share the love of Christ and to minister to the suffering... or not?

Part 2: Biblical and Historical Preparation: Equipping the Congregation

- How do we recover what it means to be a pilgrim people?
- How do you view God differently as you look at the Old Testament through the lens of migration? How might you see God as One who accompanies refugees?
- How might Mary’s prayer, “Let it be,” impact how you understand holy hospitality?
- How might we prepare for our own suffering and then empower each other to go to the suffering? In what ways do you see this happening?
- How have you received hospitality from others? From Christ? Is there an image or story that embodies Christ’s hospitality for you?
• Help your congregation observe “Las Posadas,” enacting the Holy Family’s search for hospitality and reflect on what it is like to deny and be denied hospitality.

• How would our lives look different if we really took to heart the idea that all Christians are “resident aliens”?

• What is the invitation from God after this study? What do we seek in ministering with asylum seekers?

• Read and discuss The Bible and Borders by Daniel Carroll or Seeking Refuge by Matthew Sorens.

• Consider now how you might guard against setting your own expectations upon asylum-seekers that you will begin sharing your life with. How might you begin preparing now to embody cultural humility?

Chapter 3: Developing Blueprints and Setting the Structure

• How are you ready for change and growth?

• How can you get clear on what is your work to do?

• Where is the anxiety? What is motivating this endeavor?

• How can you clarify, simplify, and stay flexible?

• How might God want to birth something in you? What does it mean to be hospitable to God’s work in you? Mary gave consent for God to use her. What does a fully yielded Christ follower look like? How would you describe this kind of life?

• What can we do well? Evaluate your strengths and limitations both personally and corporately.

• How can we extend hospitality and not slip into fixing someone else’s problems?

• How do you identify and honor high levels of investment in your congregation and laity?

• Write a litany based on Scripture, drawing attention to God’s mercy with those who suffer.

• What are the needs in your community for immigrants?

• What are your strengths and growing edges personally? As a team? As a congregation? As a community or town?
• What passages in Scripture are your guiding passages as you consider embarking on a journey of hospitality with asylum seekers or refugees?

• Go somewhere (restaurant, grocery store, event), where you are the minority and you do not speak the language. Notice how you feel and what you experience. Attend another church where you do not speak the language.

• Prayer: Lord, help me receive what comes at me today with grace and wisdom.

Chapter 4: Maintaining the House: The Skills that Were Called Forth

• What is your purpose in beginning a ministry of this sort? How can you keep your purpose paramount and not get bogged down in details?
• What constraints do you have as you begin this ministry? How might you be able to turn those into an opportunity?
• What skills are you developing personally as a leader? What new skills are being called forth from you as a congregation?
• In what ways have church leadership demonstrated prophetic, priestly, or kingly leadership?
• How can you listen to the marginal voices around you? What are they saying about ministry with immigrants?
• How can your ministry avoid paternalism and seek mutuality and relationship?
• How have you experienced the life cycle of a group before?

Chapter 5: Conclusion: Theological and Pastoral Reflection

• How have you seen the Holy Spirit at work around you as you prepare for and engage in ministry with immigrants?
• What have you learned about God from people of a different culture?
• How can you make space for lament? What are your laments? Write a prayer of lament.
• What gives you hope? Describe the hope that you experience in building relationships with immigrants.
Appendix II
Resources: Choruses, Prayers, Litanies

Choruses

Goodness is Stronger than Evil
Goodness is stronger than evil
Love is stronger than hate
Light is stronger than darkness
Life is stronger than death . . .
Archbishop Desmond Tutu, written during apartheid in South Africa.
Put to music by John Bell, Iona Scotland

A River Flows Through Babylon / En Babilonia Hay Ríos
Refrain:
A river flows through Babylon
And poplars line the shore.
It’s there we weep, for hope is gone
And we will sing no more.

Our captors as us for a song,
But can we sing of God
When songs of home seem strange and wrong
And joy feels like a fraud? Refrain

Could we forget the homes we lost?
How long will justice fail?
Somehow, someone will pay the cost
And balance out the scale.

Bridge:
Let justice come as rivers flow
And cleans the land of evil’s stain.
Let righteousness like waters fall
And wash away our tears of pain. Refrain.²⁴⁹

Text: Adam M.L. Tice, b. 1979 tr María Eugenia Cosmos, b. 1969 and Carlos Colón, b. 1966 copyright 2019 GIA Publications, Inc.

More music for worship:
I Am Crying Out to God / Al Señor Clame
Love Shall Overcome / Vencerá el Amor
Both pieces by composer Carlos Colón

Copyright 2019 GIA Publications, Inc.
Las Lamentaciones de Rufina Amaya

Te Deum Latinoamericano
Piece commissioned by Pope Francis for the 2018 canonization of Saint Oscar Romero.
*Both pieces by composer Carlos Colón

For more hymns and music, see Santo, Santo, Santo a bilingual hymnal for worship.

Litanies and Prayers

Renewing our Covenant Together

Brothers and Sisters, God has not called us to journey alone but to walk hand in hand.

Let us reach out to one another in faith and friendship.

We have been welcome into God’s family.

Let us extend welcome and open arms to one another with hope and hospitality.

We are being transformed by the love of God made known in Christ.

Let us embody that love to one another and to our neighbors.

We are a part of God’s Church, the Body of Christ.

We offer our time, our unique gifts, and our resources to God’s work in this place.

We commit ourselves to Christ’s ministry of redemption.

We covenant, as a people of faith, to worship and walk with one another.

We have renewed our commitments.

Let us be faithful even as God is faithful. Amen.

Covenant Day 2021, DaySpring Baptist Church

In the midst of a world where people hunger and thirst, come worship a God who feeds the hungry.

In the midst of a world where people are abused and oppressed, come worship a God who calls for compassion and justice.

In the midst of a world filled with war and rumors of war, come worship a God who desires only peace for the world.

In the midst of a world of spiritual emptiness, come worship a God who gives life meaning.

Come, worship our God whose grace and love know no end.

DaySpring Baptist Church, July 2022

Call to Worship from Psalm 146
I will praise the Lord all my life

I will sing praise to God as long as I live

God upholds the cause of the oppressed

And gives food to the hungry

The Lord lifts up those who are bowed down
The Lord watches over the foreigner
The Lord reigns forever
    Let us worship the Lord. Hallelujah, Amen.

Prayers

O Lord, forgive my sins against my sisters and brothers.
    Where I have created walls around my heart… have mercy.
    Where I have been hesitant to know… have mercy.
    Where I have labeled and condemned… have mercy.
    Where I have been too afraid to be honest… have mercy.
And grant me your grace that I may love...
    Those who are different than I am,
    Those who are in need of my time,
    Those who have hurt me or offended me,
    Those who may not love me back.
In the presence and power of Jesus, I pray.
(unknown)

Responsive Prayer of Confession

Lord, we confess our need for your grace. We do not always do the things we know are right to do. We have sinned and humbly ask for your forgiveness.
Forgive us if we have been callous. Give us compassion.
Forgive us if we have been lazy. Give us inspiration.
Forgive us if we have been too afraid. Give us courage.
Forgive us if we have been selfish. Give us generosity.
Forgive us if we have been dishonest. Give us integrity.
Thanks be to God, Through Jesus Christ our Lord we are forgiven.
(unknown)

Merciful God, we confess that we have been unfaithful to you and unloving to those around us.
When those in need have cried out for help, we have turned our backs upon them, and in so doing have shut the doors of our hearts to your love for them through us.
Forgive us and may the mercy we receive be apparent in the lives we live.
Through Christ, our Lord, Amen.
(unknown)
Prayer for weapons to be turned to instruments of abundance and peace (Isaiah 2:4)

Holy God, We come with thankful hearts for your presence in our lives and for your abundant provision. We thank you for baptisms and hearts turned towards you, for families and the servant hearts of the faithful of God who are living testimonies of your goodness. Most of all, we are thankful that through Jesus Christ you forgive our sin and call us to you. We are grateful God, that you redeem and restore all things and we continue to seek that restoration in our own lives and in this world. As we enter this Advent season, we pray that you would cause us to turn our distracted hearts towards you and grow in us a fervent love for you as we wait. We hold our gratitude mixed with concern for all that is not right in this world. O Lord there is a famine of peace and a pervasive hunger for meaning and justice. We lament and pray for you to make all things right. With the prophet Isaiah, we long for weapons to be turned into instruments of peace and abundance and we long for all to realize your just and righteous love. We give to you today our grateful and our heavy hearts. Take and heal us, that we may be your people in this place who choose to reflect your light and love in all ways. Amen.

Pastoral Prayer – Darkness to Light

O Lord where there is darkness bring light, where there is violence bring peace, where this is brokenness mend hearts and minds and bring healing and restoration. Where there is despair bring hope where there is hunger and thirst provide sustenance, where there is anger bring a softening and acceptance of you. Nothing is too far gone that you cannot redeem and restore.

O Lord our hearts lament at the corruption, violence, and pain of this world, that cause so many to flee their homes. Our hearts lament for lives that are hurting and broken. Lord may your kingdom come on earth, as it is in heaven. Bring justice and empower your Church to be your agents of mercy. Help us O Lord to see how we might be your hands and feet.

We give you thanks for calling upon us and for how you have empowered us through the Holy Spirit to serve in ways we never would have thought possible. We are humbled by your faithfulness Lord and rely upon you for all things. To you O God, be all honor and glory through Jesus Christ. Amen.

Prayer of being light-bearers

Holy and Almighty God, to you, we lift our hearts today. You created us in your image and through Jesus Christ we have been set free to walk in new life. We lay down our sorrows and confess our need for you today, clinging to your promise that you will make all things new. For all who are in need of your healing and renewal, we pray. Will you give us eyes to see the hurting and all who are in need of your light and love that we may be your instruments of love in this place. We offer ourselves to you today in worship. We praise you for your love that will never let us go. Fill our hearts with your praise, may the Holy Spirit be evident teaching, Prayer of Lament and Thanksgiving

Lord of Life and Love,
We echo the prayers of the Church this week as we live in a world where all is not right and yet it is also a world of beauty, where we catch glimpses of Your grace, mercy, and creativity.

For all that is broken . . . we lament
For all that is gift . . . we give thanks
Our hearts are heavy for the brokenness on display this week. For the people of Afghanistan and Haiti who suffer unbearable calamity, war, and violence. Where there is despair bring hope, relief, and healing. Strengthen the people of God to minister in these places of deep hurt. For the many homeless in our city, for immigrants waiting in shelters and refugees fleeing violence O Lord have mercy. Lead us Lord in how to respond in Christ-like love to the challenges of our world.

For the gift of being co-laborers with Christ – sharing in your wide mercy and love, for the assurance that we are never alone, even on the darkest of nights and when we cannot see nor sense your presence God, you are with us. We give thanks. For the gift of life and love in Christ – a gift we do not deserve and have not earned. You, O Lord, heal brokenness and redeem pain. Take our reluctant and distracted hearts and breathe new life and love into our lives. You can take a humble and repentant heart and make a saint. For all this, we give thanks.

For all that was broken, we lament
For all that is gift, we give thanks
For our past that haunts us and for grief that still lingers
For the sins of our ancestors that still plague us today – we lament and seek your healing.

For the gifts of family, friends and mentors who have guided us into your light. For the relationships you have mended and lives you have redeemed and healed . . .
For the testimony of your faithfulness in the lives of the saints and all the unsung heroes of the faith who have held high the Christ light for us – we give thanks.

For all that will be broken, we lament
For all that will be gift, we give thanks
The trials that this world brings, will continue
Violence and injustice, sin and brokenness, the lure of consuming and pacifying to make ourselves feel better, the enticements of this age and the age to come we lament and ask that you strengthen us to stand fast and ever cling to you. Give us grace and mercy to live with the mystery of a fallen world, held in the hands of You, our good and loving Creator.
For the people of God who will continue to seek ways to live faithfully as your people. For the ways you will reveal yourself to a new generation and for your love for all people that will not tire we give thanks. Guide us Lord as we seek to be gift, as we seek to be your hands and feet bringing hope and light for those seeking asylum. Be in our planning and praying, guiding, and teaching us how to receive and give the hospitality of Christ.

We ask all these things in the name of Our Lord and Redeemer, Jesus who is the Christ and who reigns with you O Lord God and the Holy Spirit, one God now and forever. Amen.

Quotes

The social thought and the social practice inspired by the Gospel will always be characterized by a sensitivity towards those who suffer most, those who are extremely poor, those who are overwhelmed by all the physical, mental and moral evils that afflict humanity, including hunger, contempt, unemployment and despair. You need to look for the structural causes that promote the different classes of poverty in the world. Pope John Paul II

---

250 Romero, Through the Year with Oscar Romero, viii BIBLIOGRAPHY

https://chalmers.org/resources/books/when-helping-hurts-the-small-group-experience/.

Kansas University. “History of Strengths Perspective at KU.” https://socwel.ku.edu/history-strengths-perspective#:~:text=A%20strengths%2Dbased%20approach%20was,Chamberlain%20Wallace%20Kisthardt%20W.

0seekers%20must,to%20request%20the%20opportunity%20to%20apply%20for%20asylum.

Southern Poverty Law Center and the National Holocaust Museum. https://www.splcenter.org/20181002/history-asylum-united-states %E2%80%9D%20in%20her%20conceptualization.

The Humming Bird. “Address to the Ladies of Great-Britian in Behalf of the Negro-Slaves.” 1, no. 7 (June, 1825): 201.

Tucker, Dennis. “Old Testament Through the Lens of Migration.” Presentation to DaySpring Baptist Church (October 21, 2021).

